THE PREFACE.

OW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my selfe, to undertake a worke of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weakke, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawning of day; when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my younger yeares: and before any wound received; either from Fortune or Time, I might yet, well have doubted that the darknesse of Age and Death would have covered over both. It and mee, long before the performance. For beginning with the Creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, within this our renowned Island of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better forced, with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other traualles; to haue (as I could) the runlynted and scattered frame of our English affaires, whome of the Yuiuer fall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) when the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a carelesse life, & a time, as to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soule-percing wounds, which are euery aking while vncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Adversitie; the former enforcing, the latter perswading, haue caused me to make my thoughts, legible, and my selfe the subject of euery opinion wise or weakke.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) shed much better in any age. For, Prosperity and Adversity haue euery more tryed and vniued vulgar Affections. And as we see it in experience, That does doe alwayes barkt at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude; who, wanting that veritie which we call Honesty in all men and that especiall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne without hearing, and wound, without offence giuen; lead there vnto by vncertaine reports only; which his Maiesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Stracides) before thou haue enquired the matter; vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, yes fine taste, fine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witnesse, without iudge, malicious and deceeuable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue Saint Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, then this of Seneca; Conscientia satisfaciatur: nihil in tantum laboremus, sequatur vel mala, dum bene mereris. Let vs satisfie our owne consciences; and not trouble our felues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised for we deserue well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prised it before my priuate: the general acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than doth a faire sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack; & the contrary no other harme than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I knowe that I lost the loue of many, for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honor in the dust; though further then the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what deuice they did it, He that is the Supream Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of their fame, which hath bene begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind; but content myselfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can trauell the World without a passport. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility, to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying & extensive vertue of dead Earth, & of that breathing life which God hath cast vpon slime & dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read & heare, and among those that are, whom we see & conuers with; every one hath receiued a seuerall picture of face, & every one a diuers picture of minde; every one a forme apart, every one a fancy & cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many naturall & vnnatural; wise foolishly; manly, & childish affections, and passions in mortall Men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme internall.

And though it hath pleased God, to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe; yet, as the fruit tells the name of the Tree; so do the outward workes of men (sofar as their cogitations are acted) giue vs where to guesse at their self. Nay, it were not hard so to expresse the one by the other, very neare the life: did not craft in many feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, teach euery capacity, according to the compasse it hath, to qualifie and make ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non libet. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaiour: the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth, cannot long dissimble their owne natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may be sometimes seene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our eye Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus: The people are euill Iudges of honest things, and whose Wisdome (leastest) is to be despised; if to the better sort; euery understanding hath hab a peculiar iudgement, by which is both censured other men, & valued it self. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange; though I finde these my worthles papers torne with Rats: seeing the stobfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to taxe the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition; the seuerest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie; the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lye in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since; & that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie wayes of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

Ecclesiast.
Nihil facilius,
quam reprehendere alium.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages; to giue, as neare as I can the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words; I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge. That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world is false had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea it hath triumphed ouer time; which besides it nothing but eternitie hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the past and denouing space of many thousands of yeares; & giuen so faire & piercing eyes to our minde; that we plainly behold lining now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise worke (saith Hermas) of a great GOD, as it was then, when it was so to it selfe. By it (I say) it is that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned; how it was covered with waters; and againe re-peopled. How Kingdomes and Kingdomes haue flourished & fallen; and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wreched, both the one & the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and out of the depth and darkenesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens for-past miseries with our owne like errors & ill desertings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of obscure torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth pierce through all our praunces; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accusor, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formalitie, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that Heauenly wisdomesse confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) hauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke he can hide it from the everlasting gods; he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue playd with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The markes, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others,

The Preface.

does not feare their owne fault. GOD S iudgements vpon the greater & greatest haue bene left to posteritie, first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to paynt farre off, and to speake of the conuersion of Angells into Devils, for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gnawne the grasse of the earth with beasts for pride and ingratitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharao, when he slue the Infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Iezabel, in couering the Murder of Naboth by a triall of the Elders, according to the Law with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practise, perill, bloudshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make them selues and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babilō, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, &c. therest, no fruit, flower, grasse, nor leafe, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum eueruntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is either ouerturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes: All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward & forraign force, or by inward negligence & dissension, or by a third cause arising from both: Others obserue, That the greatest base (wrecked) vnder their own weight, of which Luic hath a touch: or grew, vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery Estate; before their first foundation and erection. But hercof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolue.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue undertaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after and ouer-take farre off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath bene gathered by our owne Kings, and their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine and humane letters, the successe of infidelitie, iniustice, and crueltie; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred vp a like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuacie; Or otherwise best suited with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer vouchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long processe of time, and won to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruites of irreligious policie, as well among those examples that are found in ages remoued farre from the present, as in those of later times. And that it may no lesse appeare by euident proofe, than by asseueration, That ill doing hath alwaies bene attended with ill successe, I will here, by way of preface, runne ouer some examples, which the works ensuing hath not reached.

The Preface.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the violence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods Iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossessed, ouer-reach, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them, whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edward the Second; it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (scarcely few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the young yeares of Edward the Third, made his knowledge of this horrible fact no more then suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be living; the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeed treason in himselfe, (had his Vncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it other wise; though he caused Mortimer to dye for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edward the Third: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had bene tempered with innocent bloud. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwayes tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples. The Barles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montague & Spencer, who though in themselves as great Politicians in those daies as others haue done in those: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the Murder of Gloucester; died some after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully then did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Paiments:) Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cousen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster; afterwards Henry the fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, & his obtaining the Crowne traitorous who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recovery of his proper inheritance; brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament; to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that hee had enjoyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had bene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies & rebellions: he saw if soules immortal see & discern any thinge after the bodies death) his Grand childre Henry the first, & his Son the Prince, judenly & without mercy, murdered the possession of the Crowne (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race, & by the Issues of his enemies worne & enioyed; enemies whom by his own practise he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom questionlesse; by entailing the same vpon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no other wise, but that these cautious prouisions of the father, seconded by the valour & skillfull viciories of his son Henry the first, had buried the hopes of euery Competitor vnder the shade of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Causaubon all true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertentes dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamâtinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ: A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue bene founded & rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixt, upon whom the great storme of his Grandfathers grieuous faultes fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-child of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced ( by which match he might haue defended his inheritance in France ) & married the Daughter of Aniou, ( by which he lost all that hee had in France ) so in condescending to the vnworthy death of his Vnckle of Glocester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster: He drew on himselfe & this kingdome the greatest ioynts-losse & dishonor shau ever it suffered since the Norman Conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit vn fort gentle Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vn fort mauuois temps. That he was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a very vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolk were the praeiudices and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the Duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had bin absolute: the Queene in respect of her personall wound, pretreaque iniuria forma, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the cause: the success to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew rapelike fast as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments & armes; in which quarrell, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolued. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike down Yorke: yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoyled Henry the Father, and Edward, the son, both of their line and Kindome. And what was the end now of that polittique Lady the Queene, other then this, That she liked to behold the wretched end of all her partakers: that she liued to looke on, while her Husband the King & his anely son the Prince, were heuen in iunder: while the Crowne was set on his head that did it. Shee liued to see her selfe despoyled of her Estate, and of her mouables: and lastly, her father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Barldome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to became a starke Begger. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides cal- Siracides. 19.

leth fine but vnrighteous for other fruit hath it neuer yeilded since the world was.

And now it came to Edward the fourth turne (though after many difficulties to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up: none only Earle of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise it selfe stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragickall Actours, there was not one, that escaped the iudgement of G O D in the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence then he him-self had formed in his owne imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixth, his Predecessour: taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sons & successors Edward and Richard. For those Kings which haue sold the blood of others at a low rate, haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Maister in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although for the necessity of his Tragedie, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, then all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that played with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly vpon the affections of Hastings, and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene, and to all her kindred, as he easily allured them to conspire against the Riuer and Grey, the Kings Mother, small Uncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be seuered from him: secondly, he wrought in their consents to haue them imprisoned and taken (for the avoiding of future incontinence) to haue their heads seuered from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Deuill had written on every poss namely, To depreesse those whom they had pricked and to destroy those whom they had depreessed; Hee charged that argument so farre, and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the young king himselfe, of his brother, could satisfie him the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, that, whensoever the King or his brother, should haue able yeares to exercise their power, they would take a most seuerer vengeance of that cruelle wrong offered to their Uncle and Brother, Riuer and Grey: so that

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hailings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: And yet the Duell, who nearly distressed by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when he found by Gates by who founded him, that he was not so formidable, He first refused to kill him (sitting in council: wherein having sayled with his sword; He set the Hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite, He caused his head to be stricken off, before he ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this upon Hailings. I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Earle Rivers, Grey and others, were without triall of Law, or offence giuen: by Hailings aduise executed at Pomfret. I say Hailings himselfe in the same day, & (as I take it) in the same house, in the same lawlesse manner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

The Preface.

But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration persuaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings onely sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivred up by his trustiest friends. He had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peeres. And what successe had Richard himselfe after all these mischiefs & murders policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion? after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords; other than the prosperitie of so short a life as it tooke end, ere himselfe could well looke over and discern it? The great outcry of innocent blood, obtained at GODS hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonor, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King Henry the 7. cut off; & was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politicke Prince he was if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beate downe & overturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the crowne as ever King of England did. I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his affectiōs in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies wayed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the eleventh, whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like; but he was farre more iust, and began not their processe whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any modulation in rewarding his servants, & therein exceeding wise for whatsoever him selfe gave, he him selfe received backe the thanks & the love, knowing it well that the affections of men purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits were waynes that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he greeted his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. How so ever, the taking off of Stanlics head, who sat the Crowne on his; & the death of the young Earle of Warwick, son to George D. of Clarence, served as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eighth; if all the pitties and Paternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he aduance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers, from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Haruest burnt them in the Fire? How many wines did he cut off, & cast off as his fancy & affection chaged? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly cawle towards the block) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the accompt) did he execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to haue given his accompt to GOD for the abundance of blood already spilt: He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father; & executed the Earle of Surrey the son; the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, having neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own ho-now & the Kings service; the other, neuer having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised, the other no lesse valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the Fatherlesse, & widowes at home: and besides the ruaine enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more Treasures than all our victorious Kings did in their severall Conquests: what carelesse and cruell warres did he make upon his owne Nephew King James the fifth? What Lawes & Wills did he devise to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and cut downe those branches, which sprang from the same roote that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase; though, for themselves in their severall kindes, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood, which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen up in the North, God hath dissipated by the sunshine of his grace: from whence His Maiestie now fluing, & long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foule spots, by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bene defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood, which the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stayned both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England, it may truly be avowed: That he hath received it even from the hand of God, and hath stayed the time of putting it on; howsoever he were provoked to hasten in it: that He neuer tooke revenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever Princesse did. That his Maiestie entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open; and into which, by a generall love and Obedience, Hee was received. And howsoever His Maiesties preceeding title to this Kingdome, was performed by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the year, 1559) yet he neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Pradecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought we to forget or neglect our thankfulness to GOD for the uniting of the Northern parts of Britanny to the South, to wit of Scotland to England, which though they were severed but by small brookes and banks, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affliction of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings which His Maiestie hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty greivances together & heap them up to their height, they wil appeare but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since then, haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White; for the greatest happinesse; (Christian Religion excepted) that ever this Kingdome received from GOD; certainly the peace betweene the two Lions of gold & gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former: for by it, besides the sparing of our brittish blood, heretofore and during the difference, so often & abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more inabled to recover her ancient honor and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the years 1588. ioyned the army which hee commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast, & had his Maieſty at the ſame time declared himſelfe againſt vs in the north: it is eaſie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue brought this union a farre greater praiſe than it hath ſince coſt vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Common weale or Kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cauſe to lament. Kings live in the world & not about it. They are not infinite to examine euery mans cauſe, or to relieue euery mans wants. And yet in the latter, (though to his owne prejudice) His Maieſtie hath had more compaſſion of other mens neceſſities, than of his own Coſſers. Of whom it may be ſaid, as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderſtand with Pineda, ſo be means by Liberality, but by Latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better ſpoken of His Maieſtie, than of any King that euer Englad had; who as well in diuine, as humane vnderſtanding, haue exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

in Sal. 1. K. 4.

I could ſay much more of the Kings Maieſty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of preſumption, & will haue ſuſpect, that it might befall theſe papers of mine, (though the loſſe were little) as it did the Pictures of Queene Elizabeth, made by vnſkilfull and common Painters, which by her own commandement were knockt in peeces and caſt into the fire. For ill Artiſts, in ſetting out the beauty of the external: and weakners writers in deſcribing the vertues of the internal: doe often leaue to poſterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the moſt perfect and Princes mindes, a moſt defective representation. It may ſuffice, and there needes no other diſcouſe; if the honeſt Reader but compare the cruel & turbulent paſſages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpoſe I haue inſerted this breife diſcouſe) with His Maieſties temperate, reuergeleſſe, and liberall diſpoſition: I ſay that if the honeſt Reader weigh them iuſtly, and with an even hand: & will but beſtow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He ſhall find, that there is no man that hath ſo iuſt cauſe to complaine as the King himſelfe hath. Now as we haue tolde the ſucceſſe of the trumpeteries and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great perſonages: ſo we finde, that GOD is euery where the ſame GOD. And as it pleaſed him to puniſh the vſurpation, & unnatural cruelty of Henry the firſt, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: ſo dealt He with the ſons of Loys Debonaire, the ſon of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after ſuch time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the ſon of Pepin the eldeſt ſon of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, and then cauſed him to die in priſon, as did our Henry to Robert his eldeſt brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poiſoning, imprifonments, & civil waire, till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himſelfe of his Nephew by a violent death; & of his baſtard Brothers by a civil death (hauing incloſed them with ſure guard, al the daies of their liues, within a Monastery) held himſelfe ſecure from all oppoſition: Yet God raiſed vp againſt him (which he ſuſpected not) his own ſons, ſo vex him, ſo invade him, ſo take him priſoner, & to depoſe him; his owne ſons, with whom (to ſatiſſie their ambition)

he had ſhared his eſtate, and giuen them (vpon vs to wear, and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Tea his eldeſt ſon Lothaire (for he had four, three by his firſt wife, & one by his ſecond; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cauſe of his depoſition: That he had vſed violence towards his brothers and kinſmen; and that he had ſuffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be ſlaine, eo quod, ſaith the Text, fratribus; et propinquis violentiam intulit, et nepotem ſuum, quem ipſe liberare poterat, interfici permiferit: Becauſe he vſed violence to his Brothers and Kinſmen, & ſuffered his Nephew to be ſlaine whom he might haue deliuered.

reſcrib. 1. 5. c. 1.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe, namely, repent him of his crueltie. For among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Aſſembly of the States, it followes: Poſt hæc autem palam ſe eraffe conſeſſus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodoſij exemplum, poenitentiam ſpontaneam ſuſcepit, tam poſt ibidem. de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem geſſerat: After this he did openly confeſſe himſelfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodoſius, hee vnder-went voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done againſt Bernard his owne Nephew.

This he did: and it was praiſe-worthy. But the blood that is vnjuſtly ſpilt, is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. Theſe Medicines, miniſtred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King as I haue ſaid, had foure ſonnes: To Lothaire his eldeſt he gaue the Kingdom of Italy; as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire. To Pepin the ſecond ſon he gaue the Kingdom of Aquitaine; to Loys, the Kingdom of Bauier; and to Charles, whom hee had by a ſecond wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdom of France. But this ſecond wife, being a Mother-in-law to the reſt, perſwaded Debonaire to caſt his ſon Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to graten Charles which, after the death of his ſon Pepin, he perſequested to effect, againſt his Gracious child bearing the ſame name. In the meane while; being invaded by his ſon Loys of Bauier, he dies for griefe.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bauier, and Charles after wards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioine in league againſt the Emperour Lothaire their eldeſt brother. They fight neare to Auxerre the moſt bloody battaile that euer was ſtroken in France; in which, the maruelous loſſe of Nobility, & men of warre gaue courage to the Saracens to invade Italie; to the Hunnes to ſal vp Almaine; & the Danes, to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by reſon ſeizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyſter, Carloman rebells againſt his Father Charles the Bald, the Father burnes out the eies of his ſon Carloman; Bauier invades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire, Hee is aſſailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conſcience, for his rebellions againſt his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the Bald, the Vncle oppreſſeth his Nephewes the ſonnes of Lothaire, hee reſurpeth the Empire to the prejudice of Loys of Bauier his elder Brother, Bauiers armes and his ſonne Carloman are beaten; hee dies of griefe, & the vſurper Charles is poiſoned by Zedechias a Jew his Biſhop; his ſonne Loys le Beque dies of the ſame death. Beque had Charles the ſimple and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest beakes his Neck, the younger is slaine by a wild Bore; the son of Bauiere had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germany; wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderstanding, he dies a distracted begger. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes, and lastly being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to die in the prison of Peron: Loyses the sonne of Charles the simple beakes his neck in chasing a Wolfe, & of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of payson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French makes him-selfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire: who after he had once appalled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successors tooke up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their boulders, every man despised them as miserable & naked beggers. The wretched successe they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus d'un fair des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la multice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling, than either God, or Iustice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, One of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that ever the French men had, did neuer enjoy him-selfe, after hee had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol & Cabrieres to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented him-selfe of the fact, and gave charge to Henry his sonne, so do iustice upon the Murderers, threatening his sonne with Gods iudgments, if hee neglected it. But this unreasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry him-selfe was slaine in sport by Montgomery, wee all may remember what became of his foure sonnes; Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules, Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: Yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith; with all their Massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dislodge, the Protestants remaine more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong cities than ever they had.

Let vs now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscouia, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, having bene the most mercilesse. For besides those of his owne blood and Nobility which he caused to be slaine in his owne Court & Chamber, as Sancho Ruis the great Master of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom hee cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile, He made away the two Infants of Arragon his Cousin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nuyges de Guzmá, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutierrez his great Treasurer, and all his Kindred; & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other, foureteene, he murdered them there. Nay he spared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Last by, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Deane, to be killed of purpose to enjoy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Aben Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobilitie; that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to leuy (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. Yea, he would needs assist the Hangman with his owne hand, in the execution of the old King, in so much as Pope Urban declared him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having bene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Altramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance; which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer bene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne who, after his traitorous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancelour of France, the Bishops of Coitance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Pré, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the Officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasure, and Request, (with fixtene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue maistr'd France: He was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and miserie found them out. Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eighth, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that layd the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor; & to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Iabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrarie to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted therest, as there was no meanes left for any army to invade it. This King I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne blood, and by double alliance tied vnto him; sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonsaluo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heaven and his owne Honour, to make his sonne the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world : saw him die in the flower of his yeares; and his wife great with child, with her untimely birth, at once together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alphofo Prince of Portugall, becheld her first husband break his necke in her presence; and being with child by her second, dyed with it. A iust iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Duchesse of Viseo The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-duke Philip, turn'd foole, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eighth, He saw cast off by the King: his mother of many troubles in England; the mother of a Daughter, that in her unhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood, lost Calice to the French; and diu heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue maistors of a new name; and by a strange family are gouerned and posselt.

lib. 333.

Charles the first son to the Arch-duke, Philip, in whose ruaine enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almanes, & other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Capitaines, were consumed: who gaue the world a most perilous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany; and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insprug, and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions wherein hee concocted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in cyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Penfioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip from whom he crery slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

Netherlands.

His Son againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand, wrestled by his ancestors from Iaquelme their lawfull Princeesse; & to possesse in peace many other Provinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that malicious Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour by the Nobilitie of those countries; not onely forgot the Present made him vpon his entrie, of forty millions of Florens, called the Noualeaide; nor onely forgot, that hee had twice most solemnly sworn to the Generall States, to maintaine and preserve their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirty and five Earles before him. Conditionall Princes of those Provinces: but beginning first to constrainne them, and enbrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intollerable impositions; he lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, to tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after hee had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oathes (which Dispensation was the true cause of the warre & bloodshed since then); and after hee had tryed what he could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobilitie, vnder the gouernment

The Preface.

ment of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, the Cardinall Granuile; He employed that most mercilesse Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua, followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom he first slaughtered that renowned Capitaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaure; & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn; made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, & cut off in those fixe yeares (that Alua gouerned) of Gentlemen & others, eighteen thousand & fixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therein garriisoned. Towards whose Pay & Passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600 thousand pounds. Which monies receiued, He suddenly surprised the Cittadels of Antwerp & Nemeures: not doubting (being vsuspected by the States) to haue posselt himselfe of all the maistring places of those Provinces. For whatsoeuer he ouerly pretended, He held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escouedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this perimie, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe, after hee had murdered so many of the Nobilitie; executed (as before said) eighteen thousand fixe hundred in fixe yeares, & most cruelly slaine Men, Women, and Child, in Mecklin, Zurphén, Naerden and other places: & after hee had consumed fixe and thorty millions of treasure in fixe yeares: not withstanding his Spanish rancour, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milke-tubbs: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation, leauing his Maisters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, then he found them at his first arriual. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceipt of himselfe ouer-came the greatest difficulties; though his iudgements were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearfull breach of faith bring forth, other than the King his brothers iealousie & distrust; with the criminely death that seized him; even in the flower of his youth? And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie, who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Maister both England & the Netherlands; being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, Hee was at the first arriual, & before any access to the King by certaine Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warre as than his) rudely murdered in his owne lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile, & successe in this businesse, there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For hee hath paid aboute an hundred Millions & the liues of aboute foure hundred thousand Christians for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; & for reuenue, did equal his West Indies: for the losse of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in despright of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when hee first beganne to impouerish and oppresse them.

The Preface.

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of State, and politique subtilty, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation, pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon themselves, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and scene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties, as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselves; and the other neuer haue succeeded; if no such opposition had euer bene made. GOD hath sayd it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; and the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we haue, we hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or perswade our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither looke behind vs what hath bene, nor before vs what shall be. It is true that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: we are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth; and we inhabit it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of eternall grace, but by reuelation. No meruaile then that our thoughts are also earthly: and it is lesse to be wondered at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Elai cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleueed our reports? And out of doubt, as Elai complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleueed, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? We professe that we know GOD: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitude non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the priuate contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well nere driuen the practise thereof out of the world. Who would not soone resolue, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues, which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an Inne or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while we act in gesture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues we renounce our Persons, and the parts we play. For Charity, Iustice, and Truth,

The Preface.

haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good words; but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the marks, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shooe at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest abundance, we our selues enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the wise: When goods increase (sayth Salomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good commeth to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuour the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leaving vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Maister Dannet, and vse his owne words. While the Emperour Charles the fifth, after the resignatio of his Estates, stayed at Vlissing forwinde, to carry him his last iourney into Spaine; He conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; and to did, notwithstanding al the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, He sayd thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time enuironed with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domesticall seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD; which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the euerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honor done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applaue of the Multitude, but as the outcrie of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer bene applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer bene despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Mantaken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groomme beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurres at the other, with equall liberty.

The Preface.

The second is the greatning of our posterity, and the consp[ec]tion of their glory whom we leaue behind vs. Certainly, of those which conceine that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be sayd of them, which Laetantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortall shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, & disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their pouerty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vp a Beggars cotage. Neciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuientium non interfunt. The dead though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuerfant with their affaires that remaine. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall wee vnderstand concerning them, whether they shall bee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (sayth he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sun? He therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, so labour and traualle in the world, not knowing after death, whether a foole or a wise man should enioy the fruits thereof: which made me (sayth he) endeavour eu[n] to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope; seeing the Prophet Elai confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But thereof wee are assured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer, till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy, nor any returne of foregone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retaine any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; & the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary, If a diuine life retaine any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; we shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their estates greater than euer the World gaue, we shall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) eu[n] detest their consideration. And whatsoeuer comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Piety, Iustice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shal we therefore value honor and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnecessary & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdome of God, which hath distinguished his Angels by degrees, which hath giuen greater and lesse light and beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betweene beasts and birds: created the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub, among stones, giuen the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides preferreth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pity: I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care. Prauided that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuitias nulla fraude quaeritas: so Ieremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equitie: and Esai the same, Woe to those that spoyle and were not spoyled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Salomon, that he commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence, not to lie in wait for blood, and not to swallow them vp aluie, whose riches we couet: for such are the wayes (sayth hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when wee were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euer: I say, if both so wit our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being, and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coneyng those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortall, and neglecting those things which are immortall, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all foolles that cannot equal his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not trodd downe their opposites; the Politician, all grosse, that cannot merchandize their faith: Yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all windeS drive vs; and when by letting fall that fatal Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Navigation of this life takes end. Then it is, I say, that our owne cogitations (those sad & seuer cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that we cry out to God, for mercy; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty to others: and it is onely then, that we are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be faued: and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to thinke, that the seuer Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth vs, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, sayth a reuerend Father, Cum hac spe ad aternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended wel; for we al desire (as Balaam did) to see the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God: if those men do not oppose him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiuenesse at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say vnto God as followeth? We beseech thee O God, that all the fallhoods, forwearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust God; that thou wilt loue iniuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolved not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue bene vniust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainly these wise worldlings haue either found out a new God, or made One: and in all likelihoode such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth wore in his Cappe; which when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practise of a Cardinal and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnack to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be redrewards a Leaden, but not towards the euermourning God. But of this composition are all deuout louers of the World, that they feare all that is diuelse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practises of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but vpon shadowes: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they die under water, like Ducks, at every pebble stone, that is but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giantlike valour, against the terrible iudgements of the Al-powerfull God: yea they shew themselves gods against God, and slaues towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretched: we shall find the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instans, and both so subiect to interchange (witness the sodaine downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy rising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honor, of his riches, health, or life; but that hee may be deprived of either or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vehat, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (sayth S. Iames) what shalbe to morrow To day he is set vp, and to morrow he shall not be found: for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersity, be very obscure; yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which enuiroth worldly glory; through which, for the clearnesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let aduersity seeme what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that we

haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all we haue reioyced, or be it that we haue measured the same length of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being, wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the we, sayled out of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs & hold vs in chase, from our infancy hath gathered it. Quicquid attatus retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoeuer of our age is past, death holds it: So as who-so-euer he be, to whom Fortune hath bene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for we haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved eyther of beauty and youth, or such good delights, what it hath saued, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatsoeuer else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnvaluab; and he shall finde that all the art which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow vp after our fast-springing youth; ouertake it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it utterly, when it begins to stier: in so much as looking backe from the very instant time, & fro our now being the poore, diseased, & captiue creature, hath as little sence of all his former miseries and paines, as he, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures & delights. For whatsoeuer is cast behind vs, is iust nothing; and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it. Omnia quae euentum sunt, in incerto iacent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-lasted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life, are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu iustis es in omnibus quae veniunt supernos. And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine to our selues against GOD: as if he had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble & iust acknowledgement of Iob, The Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a fool or vngracious to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how meanes soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which GOD oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare the, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, and resolutely; & not as those whining soldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play; and hath not, in their distribution, bene partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable begger, a begger begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drough of death; That appointed Baiazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day the Foottoole of Tamerlane ( both which parts Valerius is so plaid, being taken by Saporus; that made Bellifarius play the most victorious Captain: & lastly the part of a blinde begger, of which examples many thousands may be produced. Why should other men, who are but as the leafe wormes, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolute. That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the leffe. For when on the one and the other, euery man wears but his own skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weaknes prize the passages of this world other wise ( for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenij est reuocare mentem a sensibus ) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries ( the corporall excepted ) whereunto he is subiect. Therein it is, that Misfortune & Adversitie worke all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, what soeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolisb madnesse in the slipworcke of worldly things, where all finkes but the Sorrow, so sauit it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortuna succumbere, quod tristis est omni fato, to fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

The Preface.

But it is now time to found a retreat, and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the picture of time past (which we call Historie) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine providence, every where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neare, and (as it were) linked together that the one necessarily implyeth the other: Creation, inferring Providence (for what father for akesh the childre that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disioyne this coherency; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning. Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time for by faith we vnderstand, that the world was made by the word of God be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vp, y<sup>et</sup> which he hath (notwith standing) founded the Defences and Fortrefses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reason, where in be beleued, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be maruailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrenched their mindes from the following and ouertaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles, as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles indeed.

The Preface.

indeed, because so called? Or that ipſi dixerunt, doth make them to be ſuch? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reaſon hath built any thing ſo ſtrong againſt it ſelfe, as the ſame reaſon can hardly ſuffice it, much leſſe batter it downe: the ſame in every queſtion of Nature, and finite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For ſaith Charron in his booke of Charron de la maſtraiſſe, Tout propoſition humaine a ſuſtatt d'autoritee quel autre, ſi la raiſon n' on fait la difference; Every humane propoſition hath equall authority, it reaſon make not the difference, the reſt being but the fables of principles. But herof how ſhall the ſpright and impariall iudgement of man give a ſentence, where oppoſition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpoſe it was well ſaid of Lactantius, Sapientiam ſibi adiungunt, qui ſine villo iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab alijs pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their owne wiſdome, who without any judgement approve the invention of thoſe that fore-went them; & ſuffer themſelves, after the manner of Beaſts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which ſlouch and dulneſſe, ignorance is now become ſo powerfull a Tyranny, it hath ſet true Philoſophie, Phiſick, and Divinity in a Pillory; and written over the firſt, Contra negatum Principia; over the ſecond, Virtus ſpectulativa; and over the third, Eccleſia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath sent vpon all light of Learning within the lamborne of Aristotles braines; so that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendamus in Corde tuo Lucernam intellectu: that God hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottomes thereof, the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of prizes for vs. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects, Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience, without Art. The Cheefe which knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that soure Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the soure selfe doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy, to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions; But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue a true reason for the Graffe under his feete, why it should be greene rather than red, or of any other colour, that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe, who is farre more Noble than the Elements themselves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as he is sooner beguiled to learne, than to die that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & effect telling vs what it workes (which all men know as well as be) but not what it is, which neither he nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it: ( For though I were perfect, yet I know not my selfe, saith Iob. ) Man I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will ( notwithstanding ) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not, Iob. 22.

The Preface.

and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before Man-kinde had a beginning of being. He will disabie Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the moethes of the Aire for a cause, cast the worke on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternal: which latter opinion Aristotle to make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others ( whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus ) found in the necessity of inuincible reason, One eternal and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnā esse consentiant. siue enim Natura, siue Aether, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex; idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Laërtius) though vncertaine, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence; whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Rivers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they some-times hide them-selves for a while vnder ground, & seeme to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; doe at last finde, & fall into the great Ocean; so after all the searchers that humane capacitie hath, & after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiositie; in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

As for others; and first touching those, which conceiue the matter of the World to haue bene eternall, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the Suppositio is so weak, as it hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They seeme vnto me, which affirmeth this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: inasmuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance. He had neither bene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos, eternall: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did sit it selfe to God, or God, accommodate himselfe to the matter, For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Workmans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceiue of God, that as an Artificer he applyed himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; & no more, nor no lesse, than serued to receiue the forme of the Vniuersall. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as serued to finish the worke of the World. Or had there bin more of this matter than sufficed; then God did dissolue & annihilate whatsoeuer remained and was superfluous. And this must euery reasonable sonable soule confesse, That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing, And by the same art and power; and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

The Preface.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe, this of all other, were the greatest id. otisme. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it selfe, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neq; seipsum componit corpus. There is nothing that doth præcede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saie this matter to be eternall, must of necessity confesse, that Infinite cannot be separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conclusion of this part; who soeuer will make choice, rather to beleue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madness of the kind, as wanteth teames to expresse it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it selfe, either for matter or forme; yea for as many worlds (if such had bene Gods will) as the Sea bath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the worke hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Tea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man, a foole and dylt, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words; Deus in vna exsistentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod videt, & quod non videt; to wit, causalliter, or in better teames, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed vpon all of GOD. For the most part of his workes (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes; That wee seldome entitle GOD the all-shewing, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so saluage therin, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmatiue; and the making, imposed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himselfe confesseth, quod omnes antiqui decreuerunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumq; infinitum, That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite; and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, & omnia complexi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers should rather make choice out of all blood, to conclude thus; I am out of truth, to resolute truly. For if wee compare the world vniuersall, and all the unmeasurable Orbes of Heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum, it may truly be said of them all, which himselfe affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui delruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world vniuersal, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersality and the infinity it selfe; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, vrge this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring that God being for euer a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bene for euer; so w<sup>ch</sup> the world vniuersal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, so esse a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion, to make God free in power, & bound in wil; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but worke matter being present; as fire, to burne things combustible. Again he thus disputeth, That euery Agent which can worke, and doth not worke; if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moued by it selfe, or by some what else; and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (sayth he) is immouable, and is neither moued by himselfe, nor by any other; but being alwaies the same, doth alwaies worke: Whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by God, that he was for euer the cause thereof; and therefore eternall. The answer to this is euery easie; For that Gods performing in due time that which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it selfe sufficient, others adde further, that the patterne or Image of the World may be sayd to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spirituale mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritus ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the famplar of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was æqually ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shal be. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting; and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come. The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no other wise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shal be a new Heauen and a new Earth; without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not vnworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternall and vnchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth,

That

The Preface.

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissippable) is continued, & knitt to the Diuine Being, by an individual & inseparable power, flowing from diuine vnitie; and that the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued and knitt together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue, and preserve the same. Which infinite vertue, the finite World (sayth he) is not capable of; but receiveth it from the diuine infinite, according to the temporal Nature it hath, successively euery moment by little & little; euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether, but the abolished parts succed, as the shadow of a tree in a Riuer, seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed; in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shall haue any end, and to this purpose affirme; That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort other wise than they were; which had they bene subject to finall corruption, some change would haue bene discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they will continue for euer as they are. And if coniectural arguments may receiue answer by coniectures; it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken; or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Sunnes heate, neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, navigable. But we know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which we Navigate, passable enough. We reade also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vp, by the Sunnes violent heate.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certaine, That stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mynes, and Rocks, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not inuaded and corrupted: what great alteration should we looke for in Celestiall and quint-essentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose helpe all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Gyants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue, which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of prooffe; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this objection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World Eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible wilddome, but that every Nature had bene alike eternall; and Man more rational than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equall, why not equall conditions to all? why should haughty bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betweene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progress once in every yeare: the Moone to lie by borrowed light: the first Stars (according to common opinion) to be fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power over other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, given light vnto, and reueined all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity: He may iustly be called eternall Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be sayd of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also be called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and begger; and man of all other the most miserable, eternally mortall. And what were this, but to belence againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than our Heliodorus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortall eyes, and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moone, Stars, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit. Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the fifth of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but nomina, and serving onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and bus the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia propiæ; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yes, that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath a worded. For this is vnanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam, Heonely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest ubiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materijs, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediõrũ materiãrumq; diuersitate, vel vnicũ, vel simi-

limum operatur, neque potest quandoq; ad se materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diuersity of meanes, or out of diuersity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diuersity of meanes, and the diuersity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it but worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diuersity of matter, so workes all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne, reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to gouerne: without which all things had bene but one and the same: all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we graunt Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cur Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omnemq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in shew: that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in termes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his owne will; and maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor and dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himselfe: Nature, nothing in it selfe. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heauy things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we terme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh; and therefore seeing all things worke as they do, (call it by Force, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsio, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power: we are wnder to wonder at, not to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lyes the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things; and such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath, doth yet worke all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth proue vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason, without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which haue bene deliuered by diuine letters, as the waters of a running river do successively pursue each other fr<sup>o</sup> the first fountains.

This much I say it is that Reason it selfe hath taught us : and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapientia precedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapientia goes before, Religion follows : because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato callith absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another, scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (sayth Hildore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. Leonfesse it, That to enquire further as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, and by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret iudgements, and the causes; is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione insanunt, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it : For as it is no shame nor dishonor (sayth a French Author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'asceu turpasser, For a man to rest himselfe there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further : so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeith it to be so; as understanding it selfe not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, so be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his owne Art. For seeing both Reason & Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is vns diuini spiritus in corpus humanum mersi) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reasons and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs our beleefe her. of is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tells vs, that such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceiued by man.

I haue bene already ouer-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defectiue. Among the greatest, the vnjustifiable diuision of the bookes, I can not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euently of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it sues well enough with a great many Bookes of this age, which speake too much, and yet say little; Ipse nobis furto subducitur, We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But heres, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay bold on me, because I beleuee as he doth; that who so thinks himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwayes keepe the strongest guards against themselves, so defend them from themselves from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the downefall of Babel take up the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity. Some few enterprizes greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olympiads, that ouercame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shew vp here and there in the same times; I am driven to relate by way of digression: of which we may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appeare here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages do belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them deriued to vs: though most of the Authors Names, haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government: they had Kingly rule, Nobility, Policy in war, Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speake therefore of these (seeing in a general History we should haue left a great deale of Nakednes, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is that I haue made also many others: which if they shall be layd to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the wayes of our liues: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their liues & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kinde.

The same hath bene taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater breuiety, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. (Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But we still make large digressions: yea, the teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance then were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so florished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affaires of Rome, whilst the Romans grew more mighty then the Greekes.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their seuerall beginnings in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them up. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers; who seldom giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, ioyned together, make great Rivers; till such time as they become vntited, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Phrase be weak, & the Stile not euery where like it selfe; the first shewes their legitimation and true Parents, the second will excuse it selfe vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili aera, used stronger pipes, when he sounded the wars of Aeneas. It may also be layd to my charge that I used diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Character in S. Senensis; and of these I haue borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, hauing had a eleuen yeares leasure, to attaine the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue; Howsoever, I know that it will be sayd by many, That I might haue bene more pleasing to the Reader, if I had writt the Story of mine owne times, hauing bene permitted to draw water as neare the Well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoever in writing a moderne History shall follow truth too neare the heeles, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no Mistresse or Guide, that hath led her followers and seruants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himselfe; and he that walkes after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course Temper or Basenesse. It is true, that I neuer trauailed after mens opinions, when I might haue made the best vse of them: and I haue now too few dayes remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreame ambition, or extreame cowardise, or both, do yet, (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, betwene the bed and the graue. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and taxe the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and haue it laid to my charge? But this I cannot helpe, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the Tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting the ouer anew, they shall therein accuse themselves iustly, & me falsely.

For I protest before the Maiesty of God, That I malice no man vnder the Sun. Impossible I know it is to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subiection to their private passions, but that they seeme diuers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Vnus mihi propopulo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the seruice of that inestimable Prince Henry, the sweetest hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I vnder-tooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Maister: from which al that is presented, hath received both blowes and thanks, Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis iudicij, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will indge charitably: so against those, qui gloriantur in malicia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; & therefore haue not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Naturall priuation there is no recovery, so it is seldome seene in the priuation politike. I do therefore forbeare to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receiue grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough; and too much: and it is certaine, let vs claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases; yet shall we euermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, al the hope I haue lies in this, That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Loue towards them, and well-deseruing of them, than euer I shall do againe. For had it bene otherwise, I should hardly haue had this leasure, to haue made myselfe a foole in print.

Of the Creation and Preseruacion of the World.

§. I.

That the inuisible God is seene in his Creatures.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heavens, whose Authority is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue bene created by God.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In principio, Gen. 1. 1.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth] Gen. 1. 5.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as water in the body of the Earth, is by Moles vnderstood in the Word [Earth]; and that the Earth, by the Attributes of vntwinned and void, is described to the Chances of the antient Heathen.

§. VI.

How it is to be vnderstood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Lights created, in the vntwinned substance of the Sunne; and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heat annexed vnto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters above the Firmament: and whether there bee any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

§. IX.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

§. X.

That Nature is the Principium per se, her Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effect.

§. XI.

Of Fate, and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operation may diversely be represented or furthered.

§. XII.

Of Predestination.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

§. XIIIII.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, & against Reason and Providence.

*A conclusion, by way of repetition of some

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two cheefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the Tree of Life was a material tree: and in what sense it is to bee taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruits, is made subiect to death.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not vniuersally allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the story of Adams sinne.

CHAP.

of the first Booke.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers Memorable things betwix the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

*Of the cause and reuenge of Cains sinne:
and of his going out from God.*

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Age of the Patri-archs, when they began their children.

§. V.

Of the long lines of the Patriarchs: and some of late memory.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition; and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Of the men of Warre before the Flood.

§. VIII.

That the Giants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the World: and of the Reliks of Truth touching these ancient times, obscure-ly appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may find some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

§. III.

That in process of time these latter errors drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

§. IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first y-

dols & Fables were inuented: & that the first Iupiter was Cain, Vulcan, Tubalcain, &c.

§. V.

Of the three cheefest Iupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat some afflicted the name of Gods.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme, and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

§. IX.

*Of the last refuges of the Deuill, to main-

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Flood.

§. II.

Of the flood in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Flood.

§. III.

Of Deucalions flood: and that this was not Noahs Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall flood.

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the vni-uersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene foreseen by the Starrs.

§. VI.

*That there was no need of any new Creaon of matter to make the vniuersall Flood:
and what are Catacætes Cœli, Gen. 7. 11.*

§. VII.

The Contents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

OF the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government, with their opposites: & of the degrees of humane society.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine want thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

THAT Nimrod was the first after the flood that reigned like Sovereign Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to have bene of iust authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23, 13. that Assur built Vr of the Chaldees.

§. IIII.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.

That we are not to marvel how so many kingdoms could be erected about these times: and of Vxoris of Egypt: and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affixe vnto it.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the Wars of Ninus, and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

THAT Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the auncient Magicke is not to be condemned: though the Deuill here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

§. IIII.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practices.

§. V.

The abuse of things, which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kinds of unlawfull Magicke.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead, by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

§. I.

OF the magnificent building of Ninus, by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

§. III.

Of Semiramis Barbitage, and education: and also a morphesie of her Mother.

of the second Booke.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. I.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.

The answer to one of the Objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotomia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the Objections proposed, shewing that it was not vntill that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the objections, shewing that we may haue certainty of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause why in the storie of Abraham his two Brethren should be specified.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Ge. 22. 28. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons, prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

§. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

§. X.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue bin King, lies betwene Coelelytia, and Arabia Petraea.

§. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the cheefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprouable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countreys named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the countreys whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

lute purenesse and simplicitie; was, and is pleased to make himselfe knowne by the worke of the World: in the won-derfull magnitude whereof, (all which Hee imbraceth, fil-leth, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glo-40 rious Lights of Heauen, we perceiue a shadow of his diuine Countenance; in his merciful prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisdome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern 50 per speculum reaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and varietie of Ceelestiall and Terrestriall bodies: Terrestriall, in their strange and manifold diuersities; Ceelestiall, in their beautie and magnitude; which in their continuall and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the Omnipotent cause, and by these motions, their Almightie Mouer.
- 50 In these more then wonderfull works, God (saith Hugo) speaketh vnto man, and it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that liue, witness in them-sclues; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable soules:
according to S. GREGORY, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ra-tione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Euery man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob.) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conspiciere in creaturis; To discern him in his prouidence by his Creatures. That God hath bene otherwise scene, to wit, with corporall eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my vnderstand-ing,

ding, grounded on these places of S. John, and S. Paul, Tee haue not heard his voice at any time, neither haue yee seene his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see. And this, I am sure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, Ipse enim natura, vel substantia, vel qualiter alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Eusebius, Alcinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authoritie. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnumbred Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those liuing Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cysanus, Attundus vniuersum nihil aliud est, quam Deum explicatus; The World vniuersall, is nothing else but God exprest. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are seene by creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which there was no other cause preceding, then his owne Will, no other matter then his owne Power, no other workman then his owne Word, no other consideration then his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and pattern of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnnchanged Will moued, by his high Wisdome disposed, and by his almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex essetibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neg, cuius qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, quae factae sunt, quae sunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the Word of God himselfe.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authoritie is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the world to haue bene created by God.

His worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner exprest, I meane all those who are entitiled by S. AVOVSINE, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Atercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum; The originall of the vniuersall: to whom hee giueth also the attributes of Alcans, Natura, Aetus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renouatio. And wherein hee truly, with S. Paul, calleth vpon God all power; consenting also, that the world was made by Gods almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in Saint Paul it is vled) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; which remarkable words are thus conuered: Cum abscondisset omnia Iupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great Iupiter had hidden all things in himselfe, working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Vnus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and originall, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; It isis rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinitie: (it being true, that the Scripture hath hath not want of any forraigne testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so Saint Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawful, and profitable, to remember whatsoever hee found agreeable to the Word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus, he citch Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Menander, and in the fourteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Peritus à quocumque, dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule; Qua sacris seruiunt, prophana non subit; No thing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

§. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes 1. 1.

His visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Terentian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes secke some hidden mysterie, and which in the Iewes Targum is conuered by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequent; but only to Creation. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to inform, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we fine a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite, the impossibilitie whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot bee more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth: Genes 1. 2.

He vniuersall matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers duerly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those words, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which, S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nulla re, prout nullam rem: (that is) Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme, which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the School-men, Beda, Lyrannus, Comestor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Emperyan Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Emperyan Heauen Stenchinus Euzubius calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceiue) he rather styled in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, and iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liueth in eternall Light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord, that conuerth himselfe into light: and in the Reuelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also Iohn Mercer vpon Genes, differeth not in opinion from Euzubius: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or supercelestiall; so in his iudgement, because it was in all Eternitie, the glorious seat of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercaelestem meo iudicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the

the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this acceptable, and perceivable Vniuersall; so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate & eternall: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seat of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can containe: How great is the house of God (saith BARUCH) how large is the place of his possessions! it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmesurable.

But leaving multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, aswell of all the Heauens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilis, sine posse fieri. Which matter (saith Caluin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the Vniuersall: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

§. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of conformed and voided, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards he nameth them a part, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aquae ad succunditatem vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfullnesse.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heauenly bodies, and natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt feedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. T hey shall perish (saith Dauid) and the heauens shall vanish away like smoke, saith I say. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proueth that the drie land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or feede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. Innotu Domine terram fundasti, Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: aire, fire; and so on the contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beautie and ornament. Calum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specifically water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus; & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aqua fit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seedeth seede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adorning. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecte sunt opera; The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their inuention of Demogorgon: Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ouid:

Ante Mar, & Terram, & (quod regit omnia) Calum,
Vnus erat toto naturae vultus in Orbe,

lib. 1.

Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.

Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one only face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

§. VI.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moued upon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued upon the Waters. The Saceny interpreters vnder the word superferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or souebat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensabo (saith Basil: which words incubare or sovere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab auius pulitris sine incubantibus, quoniam spirituali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their yong, not corporally, but in a spiritual and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volabat; The Spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei susflabat: or as other vnderstand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, remanebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, drive, or remove, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalm: Et

He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase. but there was yet no wind nor exhalation.

Arias Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Mterachetur, id est, efficaciter motus, consequens, ac agens super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warme, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: tehr, which is, fiat, sine erit, Let it be, or it shall be. Quae vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God; id est, vii quaedam diuina, agilis ac presens per omnia pertingens, omnia complex, that is, A certaine diuine power, or strength every where, allue and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Ataim, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my selfe I am resolute

and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For, how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiqutie) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque, distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius maiestatis aeternae, cogitatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could con-

ceiue the counsels and disposing of that eternall Maiestie; and therefore to bee ouer-curious in searching how the all-powerfull Word of God wrought in the Creation of the of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and safe Foord, will presume to passe over the greatest Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnderstanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it; but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neare the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDVLA, Vis causa efficiens; The force of the efficient cause, S. AUGUSTINUS sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, vnder the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Aercreatus nameth it, Spiritum tenebre intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: ANAXAGORAS, Mentem: TO STAVVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi; The soule of the world: and in his fixt Booke de Republica, he calleth it The Law of Heauen; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyrian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Sauour, Atem desistit, vox silet, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde sayeth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but euen the voice of Angels: so may all men to which he can, Sed consubstantialitatem illi est, quicquid est, & quicquid est; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

Nazian. lib. 1.
Th. 4.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustayneth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON, If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo presentia esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod, si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum deluerent vniuersa; God giueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

Virg. AEnid.
lib. 6. 714.

*Principio Cælum ac Terras, composui, liquentes, Lucentemq; globum Luna, Titaniasq; astra, Spiritus intus alit: totamq; insula per artus,
Atens agitas molem, & magno se corpore misces.*

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,
A Spirit within maintaynes: and their whole masse,
A Mind, which through each part infused doth passe,
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuersall.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in them their spiritualitie, and natural motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarification, and subtilitie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtil, diaphanike, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpierce: Light, for the excellency thereof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo instam, ex quaque non solum motio, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall operation given by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not onely motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth lining Creatures.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and dissimilitude of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vniued, and called the Sunne, the Organ, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes creation, and the vniued of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the first Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or natural day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters, and of the Seas, and Creatures therein: in Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expression sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Que causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe & all things else visible) but a body most illighted, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Aether, the place of the supposed Element of fire) is affected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressum: The conductor, and preseruer or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better auouched of the heate, which it transporteth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (say the Platonicks) Abeunte lumine residet in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporall, and so doth MONTAIVS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium: Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

lux dicitur, que se & omnia corpora facit, & in corpore suo consistit. cap. 1. & c. 11.

Aristotle findeth corporalitie in the beames of light; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith Piccolomini, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, Vic de finit. giue materialitie to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the solid body of glasse, or other Cristalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vnpure earthly substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obiaculum naturæ terræ, atq; fordidum, non capit candidum luminis puritatem; Because an obstacle, by nature earthly and foule, doth not receive the pure cleanness of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane vncleannesse.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile at it, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other ancient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselves therein: all (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath bene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Bede, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole-men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtil in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius accumi. ne nimio; Nothing is more odious so true wisdom, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought brought forth and denoured) resolved vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall. Corporall they say it cannot bee, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire enlightened: incorporall it cannot bee, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say, (as Petrus) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to inform it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtayne their fo being of the light; and therefore, if we deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath his being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

But in my vnderstanding, Lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof, and an intentional Species may be vnderstood by the example of a red, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or Greene glasse: for then we perceiue the same colour cast vpon any thing opposit; which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inhollandeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and vnchanged order, which God obserued in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Matheus repeateth twice the mayne parts of the vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme. first, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vniuersed, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their vertuall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his formall perfection, his circle, beautie, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vniuersed, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was, to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite every part of the inferior world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue actiuitie to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approued, and approuing it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to aske of Ion, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enioy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdras). And these which inhabit the Heauens, doe onely know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in Hem. mundo inuisibili, in mundo visibili umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes. Surely, if this Light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth nearest vnto spirituality; and if it haue any corporalltie, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for how fouer, it is of all things scene, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men, and other creatures, all celestiaall influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintayneth; it discovereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually trauaile to surmount these perceiued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (saith Saint Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, (seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem vides omnia mundus, Atundi oculus.*

Ouid. Met. 4.

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any fir-st dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceiued. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Sauour said to be that Light, which light-neith euerly man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible substance, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. *Deus perfectio non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat, nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith Hermes in Premandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.*

So then the Mass and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and informed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God enlightened: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine virtue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that feedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vniuersed, and gaue it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those severall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the middle of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmentum, or expansum (for so Varatius, Pagninus, and Iunius turne it) are not the Crystalline Heauens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against against this fancy. For the waters about the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire above vs, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakiagh, and Shamaym, being indifferently taken for the Heaven and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and Aether, then for the Heavens, as the best Hebrewians vnderstand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infimis crassius ducta, interseclat, distarent, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being secured and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters about the Firmament, exprest in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heaven is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witness, as in the blessings of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalme. * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heaven dwell; and * upon Sodom and Gomorrha is rayned brimstone and fire out of the Heaven; and in Isaacs blessing to Jacob, God giue thee therefore of the dew of Heaven; and in Deuteronomie the 11. For the land whither you goe to possesse it, is a land, that drinketh water of the rayne of Heaven; and in Iob, Who hath ingendred the frosts of Heaven; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heaven very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great heighth, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil aoucheth, that this appellation of Heaven for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocantur Deus forma nentum calum. Nec appellatio alij quidem proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmaments Heaven: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heaven) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other prooffe, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heaven, the words of MOSES in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heaven; and in the 20. Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heaven, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heaven. And what vs there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or watery Heaven, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primum nobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in verie truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would excede all possibilitie of beleefe. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; but no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and such it selfe (which surmounteth the heighth of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conductor, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can belecue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heavens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Oronim, and of this watery Heaven, Basilus Magnus in his Hexam. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and sixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters about the Heavens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendred in the vppermost Ayre.

§. IX.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

In conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter, of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heaven, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Fish, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their seedes in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preferred.

§. X.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

No for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and facultie, which God hath infused into euery creature, hauing no other feite ability, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which allo directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by severall Organs, severall effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerywhere-prefence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumental causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertueless, and dead: of which excellentie OPRHEVS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolishly by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inuenienda veritatis huic studio subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero sit temporibus, sit ingenij in eius inquisitione contritiis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisedome there to be had. Nam si de vna re praecepta scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take condescence, it hath not bene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, quae nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subsistentum Natura enim prima praevidetur et potestate diuina, prout nihil est, nisi de se ipsa. Sapientia, 3. cap. 28.

Cyprian. de mon. 1. lib. 3.

icium formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betwene matter and forme, then betwene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of ratiocall consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certain scholasticall distinctions wroote and peruer the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to procure a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to affirme with Saint AUGUSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoeuer is natural proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the feedes of all formes, and the formes of all feedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscunq; generis est, cuiuscunq; estimationis est, à quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Auerrois is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

§. XI.

Of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

AND, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely recieued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an ineuitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerful then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal:

*Ratio satum vincere nulla valet.
Sernis regna dabunt, captiuus Fata triumphos.*

Gainst Fate no counsell can preuaile.
Kingdomes to Slaues by Destinie,
To Captiuus triumphs giuen be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisaniists, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obserued: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist: Plotinus out of the Altronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestia Orbis, vnnchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a ratiocall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolomie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and ineuitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de vnoquoq; nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vlt, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not vnccertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and Stones, Mineralles, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautiful Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, we may not thinke, that in the treasure of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euery Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorn it, but for instruments and Organs of his diuine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origene vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. Gen. 1.5. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdom: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things than these be; and we haue seene but a few of his workes. And though, for the capacite of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and vtermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our senses sow and set, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestia bodies. for hardly (saith Salomon), can we discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuigilate the things that are in Heauen? Multum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heauehen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrarie, wee doe not robbe those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices, nor on the many of these second causes depoyled God of his prerogative, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by all celestia inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustificable; of whom Saint AUGUSTINE Impia peruersitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius autare scelerum, quam commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked peruerseness urge, that rather be the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celestia bodies incline the will by radiation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora celestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexionis, & dispositionis, The heavenly bodies (saith hee) make in vs habits, complexionis, and dispositions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vpon it selfe a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in vertues; for those of cholerick complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be astrayporaid; where the minde hath no reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse mind I am resolu'd, for of all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites, ouer all which, celestia bodies (as instruments and Executors of Gods providence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur satum si resistat, vincit si contempserit: Fate will be overcome, if them resist it, if them neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen soli ad generationem sensibilibus corporum conuenit, & ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AUGUSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose). And Saint AUGUSTINE: Deus regis inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above; but hee auoucheth not, that superiour bodies haue rule ouer mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferiour bodies, no more then the signes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in Iuuenis patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the Fathers vertues; and so the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the Sonnes of yertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

Egregia

Egregia est soboles, scelerato nata parente.

A worthe sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiarie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retain a saour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet saour of vertue first receyued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a fauourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandrie of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the strength of selfe-nature and kind could haue yielded them, so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by being set in a foyle sutable, and like themselves, are made more vsauourie and filled with payson. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapientis adiutus opus astrorum, quem admodum agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapientis, & amina sapientis medici dominabuntur astris, A wiseman, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall preuaile against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Vniuersal, whose influences may be called his reserved and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs consider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these Lawes doe not depriue Kings of their natural or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowne, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enioy; God being mercie, goodness, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Sauour taught; And let vs not be led into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himselfe should in a kind haue shut vp himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. AVEVS TINE) left altogether without hope!

And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be hee Pagan or Christian that so beleueth, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginarie gods of the other would thereby be depoyled of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (I haue finished the worke which thou gauest mee to doe;) and the same God, who hath threatned vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences, could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs inuincibly to the Destinies or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessitie. But it was well said of Platimus, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God vertuelesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures; for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receive influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen lumen; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Providence, Prefcience, and Predetermination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for every man hath not obserued it, though all learned men haue.

of Prefcience.

Prefcience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines Præcognitio, or præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prefcience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selues fore-know, except the same be to succcede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prefcience of God (as it is Prefcience onely) is not the cause of any thing futurally succeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowledge impose any necessitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or conframe the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perfwade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith Boetivs) beholdeth those things subiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne nature. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina providentia rebus generandis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, præmia bonorum, & pæna malorum periret; Diuine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity vpon things that are to exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euil.

§. XIII.

of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greekes call Prœnoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Prefcience (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. Augustine) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selues account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, prouide for the future, and times succeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles floure vs herof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: yea the Turkes themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoever, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture prouoing providence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith David) which covereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueth to beasts their food, and feedeth the young Ravens that cries: All these wait vpon thee, that thou mayest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the River Cheareth (saith God to ELIA) and I haue commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they sow not, nor reape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Againe, Are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haire of your head are numbered: And S. God therefore, who is euerie where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transfired his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not give my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euerie where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Prouidence is seene in his creatures. The rather prouideth for his children: beaats and birds and all liuing for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beaats, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall: Amor diuini reum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobile sustentaculum, ac vniuersa machina fundamentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immouable pillar of euerie part thereof; and the Basis and foundation of the vniuersall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only prouide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to euerie where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute transcendent habilitie of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

Of Predestination.

NOW for Predestination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Prouidence and Prence, then in this, that Prence only fore-seeth: Prouidence fore-seeth & careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthiest Wormes of the Earth, and Predestination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom S. Augustine speaking of two Cities, and two Societies, vseth these words, Quarum est vna, qua predestinata est in aeternum regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is so vndergoe euilasting torment with the Deuill: for according to NONIVS MARCELLVS, destinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Daneus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leaue them to the Diuines, and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmity perceyueeth the reason of his blindness. And againe with S. AUGUSTINE, Occulta esse causa potest, inuisa esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Predestination may be, vnist it cannot be.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by fortune, and against Reason and Prouidence.

NATVRALLY, seeing Destinie or Necessitie is subseqent to Gods prouidence, and seeing that the Starres haue no other dominion, then is before spoken, and that Nature is nothing, but as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei Organum; The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini precepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune; or Chance: a Goddesse, the most reuerenced, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Agesianicks. The Greekes call her tyche, signifying a relative being, or beriding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward the grew lo great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggars and Cottages, the ordered all things, refitting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable: valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, inasmuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which * PALLADIVS, Vita hominum ludus fortune est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels haue equal successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenaeus:

Longissimi à Sapientia Fors distidet, Sed multa periclit tamen similitudo:

From Wisdome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endeuours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub sole, cuius causa legitima non precesserit, Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatfoeuer may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the Inferior, but not besides the intention of the Superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith MELANCHTON) Quod Poete fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God; and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death, and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helme, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs, the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and herof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi, The soule of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdom, which we expresse by the name of God, gouerning euerie being aswell in heauen as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gaue the title of Necessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by inuincible ordinance: sometime, the style of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect (speaking S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis, the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was: For whatfoeuer (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, difference by diuers termes, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe, how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and empty-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, vertuous, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whofoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth: if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourse then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euermore hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deseruing well and receiuing ill, we alwaies fully charge Fortune withall. For whofoeuer shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not iust; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successer, if he be of contrarie qualities; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an obsecratur flauish course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondering at other men, and by making them beleeue that all their vices are vertues, and all their duskie actions crystalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, if not exceeded them. For according to MENDACER, Omnis inspicis arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Euerie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whofoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obsecratur them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie, that man which priueth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the authour of his owne miserie; but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let not man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world begat not a man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTUS, Potuisse (saith PETRARCH) in lectulo suo mori, potuisse integro caduere sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and bene with an vntorne and vndisencured bodie buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (praesertim de effectu) litibus persequi implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be intangled with endless contentions? Whofoeuer therefore will set before him MACHIAVELLS two markes to shone as (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden Bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first desired to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did eyther so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which priueth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sayles; as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sayles and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure navigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whatsoeuer Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolute with S. PAUL, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuersties of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

THE creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth replenished, GOD said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likeness.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingen. miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of M. E. Trif. Aik. 1. & de volunt. Dei. Plat. leg. 1. 1.) Natura ardentissima artificium, The artificial worke of the most ardent or fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the same be meant, not for any excellencie external, but in respect of his internal forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortal, and 'spiritual; in qualities, because the same was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

*Santius his animal mentisq. capacius alio

More holy then the rest, and vnderstanding more,
A liuing creature wants, to rule all made before:
So man began to be.

Met. 1. 70.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Visit Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus, & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terrae: Vnus igitur vnum fecit, qui unitatis eius haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be upon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his unitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule over the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortal soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortal and incorporeal, so the soule of man is immortal and incorporeal; and as there is but one God which gouerneth the world, so but one soule which gouerneth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Animus est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Idol maketh (saith Tassius) and these resemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

The Schoole-men resemble the Mithde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memory, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude duers; and againe, they distinguish betweene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinneth into small threads, with subtle distinctions, many times the plainestesse and sinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like etar; strong water, that catcheth thiorow and dislootheth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratiuum; A word declaring qualite in the substance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inter'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the finall soule doth not therefore leaue to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by linie, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

1. Cor. 15. 49.

But how foueuer the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we 10 bear the image of the heauenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrarie. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these words: I herewith blesse we God euen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are 120 made after the similitude of God: How foueuer therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Consequitur imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhe speaketh plainly: Quasi uero possit esse imago aliqua qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude S. Paul Col. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before 30 Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Rom. 1. 13.

16 Gen.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Atrocemius; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis limina 50 menta refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE), Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the linements of mans bodie. Deus enim non est humana forme particeps, neque corpus humanum diuine (saith PHILO) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which significeth a shadow, or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow; Let vs then know and consider, that God; who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the verie essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Hereticks: Ad similitudinem Dei propriis accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The vertue which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, inuifible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexcogitable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Demill is said to be the Prince of this World, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memory, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Demonies, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtiltie; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of Lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Gouernor ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equite. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Trenus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely; but that he vnderstood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Augustine (who herein came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente, God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne image and similitude; and REYNERIUS; Homo, quod habet mentem, factus est ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde. 30

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BEt Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift 40 of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua ueritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectuall contemplatiue, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and an intellectuall minde contemplatiue. Est autem hinc nostra (saith CYRANVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi uirtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee esteemeth it to be the verie essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith MERCURIUS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and 50 which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For as the Sunne is not of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illightened, and an illumination created; so is this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our soules the purest; and the lumen animae rationalis, by the true and eternall light illightened. And this Mens others call animam animae, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, que amor sapientie tanquam ducit sequitur, Which followeth after after the loue of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) betweene which and reason, betweene which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discouref; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, viuificat; or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giueit life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, perspicacem animae partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur, & in furiosis mens exstinguitur, anima manet, in mens that sleepe it is this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the mind or soule, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, & in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soule: for mad men doe liue, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (minde) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discouref: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vsed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to bee a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to bee disleuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERVIVS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei, Deus menti præc, mens animæ, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giueit life) is the Image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler over this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the body. This diuision and distinction out of the Platonikes and Peripateticke, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Milseus Ficinus in his ninth booke of the Soules immortallitie labourerth to proue. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (saith he) *Ad facultatem intelligentem excedendum non eget Mens organo, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat, quanquam eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectum concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasmum prolata: To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whereon to looke, and whence to conceiue the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasies, or the resemblances of things receiued from the sense & carryed to the phantasie. But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organum of any thing; but of the vnderstanding. And he addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imagination, are to his vnderstanding & mind, as colours are to the sight: whence it fo followeth, that the imagination or phantasie itself is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing; & as this is an organum, so that. Of this question, How the minde in all her actions maketh vse of the body, & hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue & learned Discourse in the last Reply of M. D. Bilson, late Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henry Iacob. How foueuer the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discouref, nor in respect of the minde itselfe by which we liue, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortall, that we are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selues to God in mentis, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference betweene the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and betweene the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which* being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to bee after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit Mens, sed, intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The minde (or Mens) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loueth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And that this Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable, heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformauit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corrupti concupiscentia affectibus immergit: Man was made after the Image and similitude of God, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortallitie, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Originall righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberalitie, that we were printed with the scale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the immutable habitie of his owne Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerful retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called, and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruite and deface his Scale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obdurate finnes. For the vniust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing Gods Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for Gods Chancie, and Mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satlans; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God; and to be short, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautie & deformity, or betweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receiue this Image of Gods goodnesse which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and dulle pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanlike of Gods Wife-dome, and the liberalitie of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impuritie of our flesh, behold the highest Heauens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during Glorie, and termelesse Joy, prepared for those, which retain the Image and similitude of their Creatour, preferring vndeliled and vnrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousnes and Holinesse, as saith S. Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes, for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne, then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not aboliish and take away these naturall gifts:); or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine Grace and heavenly Glorie, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

¶ III.

Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortal Soule.

THe externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamath, of red Earth, or, ex limo terra, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex quolibet humo, sed ex glubbar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sodome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, for that am but dust and ashes: And in these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabit, according to Iob. And though our owne eyes doe euery where behold the sudden and relentless assaults of Death, and Nature assure vs by neuer-failing Experience, and Reason by infallible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Hiuies of vnnumbred cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posits, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away leisure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of vertuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-living subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: wee plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches whiles our strength enablen vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Iob, that we must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: I hat God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

But what examples haue euermore moued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaied before vs, we heare what is promised and threatened: but the Worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which wee only see) doe neither looke vp towards termelesse ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Alaricus Victor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil deniq; morbi
Egerunt, sumus, qui nunc sumus, usq; periculi
Tentati, nibila meliores reddimur unquam, Sub vigils nullo culpae sine manentes.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same sinne caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let vs not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that wee neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which wee trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) cuen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Fraustrā sperant, quis de misericordia Dei sibi blandimur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercie.

¶ IV.

¶ IV.

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcasse God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spirituall and incorruptible; nor that God had any such bodily instruments as men vs, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. The Spirit of God (saith ELI HV in IOB) hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) *vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut viuere possit & spiraculum vite habere: Nam & Propheta cum ait, Manus tua fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari, loquutus est: Immo hic sententia (saith he) the beginner liues of carnall sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips vpon his face (being formed) that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith, Thy hands haue made me, spake thus Tropically, rather then properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi hys, qui Scripturas sensu corpore legunt? In what danger are they that reade the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, quae viuificat corpus, & animam, Which doth animate, and giue life to the bodie. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith Iob; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable Soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the bodie returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, then for the soule; as when Stephen cryed vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Iesus, receive my spirit: and in S. IOHN, And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue up the ghost, or spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the soules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life: so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, when they were taken: but the life of breath euerslasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, returne againe to God that gaue it.*

¶ V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortalitie.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and worke of the World, and whom hee made the Iast and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued with a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose Image hee was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, hee vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationally belonging vnto man, and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZENE) Homo est vtriusq; naturae vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deum igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, dum, in breui magnum, atq. exiguo totum, in terris statuit, God therefore placed in the Earth the man whom he had made, as it were another World, the great and large World in the small and little World: for out of the Earth and Dust was formed the flesh of Man, and therefore heauie and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard Rockes and Stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which OVID:

Inde genus durum sumus, experientisq. laborum, Et documenta damus, qua simus origine nati:

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approouing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which dispereth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carryed by Brookes and Riueres ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, allisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitye of the Earth; the haire of mans bodie, which adorne or ouer-shaddowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generatiue power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vnstable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our cies, to the light of the Sun and Moone, and the beautie of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat dry vp, and wither away, or the fierce puffes of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are also ayes present with God; and lastly our immortall soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne image and similitude: And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angels, deprehenso est iustitia, behold, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Iob) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man the image and similitude of his owne righteousnesse. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homō est mensura cuniarum rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed, our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Delire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which wee seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts traualle to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we beginne to take account of our times, iudge of our felues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seventh to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deare and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when Time hath made vncomfortable to others, we become a burthen to our felues: being of no other vie, then to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many lighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which wee alwayes trauell both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloved companions of honour & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by w hat crooked path soeuer we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death: whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euer runneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Stream, but neuer floweth againe: our Lease once fallen, springeth no more, neither neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leauces and Flowers.

Redditur arboribus flores reuerentibus etas, Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.

To which I giue this Ruse,

The Plants and Trees made poore and old	But neuer Man repayr'd againe
By Winter enuious,	His youth and beautie lost,
The Spring-time bounteous	Though Art, and care, and cost,
Couers againe from shame and cold:	Doc promise Natures helpe in vaine.

And of which,

CATVLLVS, EPIGRAM. 53.	Nobis cum semel occidit breuis lux,
Soles occidere & redere possunt:	Nox est perpetua una dormienda.
The Sunne may set and rise:	Sleepe after our short light
But we contrariwise	One euermlasting night.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserved, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the first power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

These be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gaue a free and vnconstrayned will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortall Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne guide, his owne Workman, and his owne Painter, that hee might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme. God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACHES) and left him in the hands of his owne counsaile. Such was the liberality of God, and mans felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that euen when they first fell from the bodies of their Dams, the nature, which they could not change, and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds and Grafts of life (to wiy) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels; whereof which soeuer he tooke pleasure to plant and cultiue, the same should futuramente grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedome of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was anigmatically described by Asclepius Aethiopianus (saith Ambrosius) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was faigned, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from Reason to Brutallitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Cruelty, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceiters; by Lyons, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensuality; by Wolves, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew remembreth to false prophets, Which come to you in shepes clothing, but inwardly they are rauening Wolves: by the images of stones and flockes, foolish and ignorant men; by Vipers, vngratefull men: of which S. Iohn Baptist, O ye generation of Vipers, &c.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the vniuersall created was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse. With whom, to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I worke; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, (but as afore-said) gaue vnto man a power generatiue, and so to the rest of liuing creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good; not that he fore-knew not, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gaue to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberrall choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitie, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

¶ I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvell that men should erre.

IConcerning the first Habitation of man we reade, that the Lord God planted a Garden, Eastward, in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, GEN. 2. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all Ages haue held dispute; and the opinions and iudgements haue bene in effect, as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: some there are, that haue conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, withoutall regard of the Worlds Geographic, and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the Heauens) the way how to find out and iudge, in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted, wherein hee was exceeding respectiue and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vnderstood one place for another; and one Error is so fruitfull, as it begetteth a thousand Children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely retrayned. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obsequient Sectatours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleue in, as they thought it safer to condemne their owne vnderstanding, then to examine theirs. For (saith Iulianus in his Epistle of Paradise) Magis erroris (magis erroris) vrorum auctoritate persuasi transmittimus; We passe over many grosse errors, by the authoritie of great men led and persuaded. And it is true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I speake it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reuerence both their Learning and their Pietie, and yet not bound to follow them any further, then they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of Knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse:

Nulli

Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God neuer gaue the knowledge of all things to any one. S. Paul couereth that he knew not, whether he were taken vp into the third heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledgeth thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi inuenitur? (saith Ios) but where is wisdom found? and where is the place of vnderstanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the liuing. And therefore seeing God found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabit in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

¶ II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to be inquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, & allegoricall? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed, and that vnder the names of those foure Riues, Pison, Gehon, Hidekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, that by the foure Riues were meant the foure Cardinal vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Honny. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued, (saith Sixtus Senensis) whose frivollous imaginations Sixtus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his first Booke. fol. 338. the last Edition. S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegoricall construction, and set Paradise in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the mind, & in nostro principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or mind; by Adam, Mens, or Vnderstanding; by Eue, the Sense; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestially and terrestriall Paradise, the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomus was of opinion, that a Paradise had bene, but that there was now any marke thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but without all the places now nor so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion Iulianus inclineth, as I conceiue his words in two severall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth, GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. *Hoc ipso etiam quod dicit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersis animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omnigenis (vs tunc erat) fructibus constam, sedem & hortum illam Adæ, & posteritatis futura fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruits and multiplie, and fill the earth, and subdunt it and rule over every creature, doe cleerely shew, that the vniuersall earth (as it is filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of ADAM, and of his future posteritie. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the Acts the 17. Apostolus ex vno sanguine omne genus humanum addo factum docet, ut habitarem super vniuersam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus ille erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell vpon all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith hee) was that Paradise. Which coniectures I will answer in order. Coropius Becanus directeth not much from this opinion; but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar Garden; which place Coropius findeth heere the Riuer of Acclmes, in the confines of India.*

Terrallian, Bonanumare, and Daradus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and possellus, quite contrarie, vnder the North pole: the Chaldaean also for the most part, and all their Sectatours, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible word, or raysed into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus, and Rabanns, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins sayes of Philo Iudens, that he wondred, Quo malo genio afflatus; By what euill Angell he was blowne up into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wanded; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, doe so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the Kingdoms and Prouinces bordering it, by the Riuer which watered it, and by the points of the Compass vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudea, or Canaan.

Nonimagus also, vpon Beda, De natura rerum, beleueth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beautie adscribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that Fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Pison, Gchon, Tigris, and Enphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Aegypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one Fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrie of Eden.

Gen. 2. 8.

O the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made. And howeuer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauit Dominus Deus Paradysum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: It is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seuerall Interpreters call it Paradysum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and do both the Chaldean Paraphrasis truly take it for the proper name of a place, & for a Nouue appellation, which Region, in respect of the fertilitie of the soile, of the many beautifull Riuers, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe allwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrie, opposite to the Ile of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrie, so called for the flourishing beautie thereof, so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for the pleasure, or delicacie: and as Florida signifieth flourishing: so Eden signifieth pleasure, & yet both are the proper names of Countries; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seate of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of Pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrarie to the translation of the Seuerall; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodore, Gregorie; and to the Rabins, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latines, Senerius, Damasceus &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasceus owne words are these, Paradysus est locus Dei maribus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confusus; Paradise is a place, maruailously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these words of Eden, and of the East, contrarie to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne words: After this I will begin so speake of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hac incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Mors enim clarissime prodit, Paradysum à Deo confusum. in regione terra Orientali, qua dicitur Eden. Eden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legitur Cham habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Eden; For Moses (saith (saith he) dath shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrie, which is called Eden: but that Eden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the East border of Eden. Perez 16. Rivis endeuoureth to qualifie this translation: for this particule (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whercon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that be his translation) aduiseeth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (amē) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden, Collocauit Deus ante Paradysum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Eden, Cherubin; He set on the East-side of the Garden of Eden, Cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (he) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, onely to the end, to find Paradise vpon the Riuer of Aeflones: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good, and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sunne riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damasceus): affirming, that we allwaies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned them selues in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwaies towards the West, thereby to auoid the superstition of the Aegyptians and Chaldeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudea, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell west from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on Earth: so by Christs death and passion wee may be made partakers of the Paradise celestiall, & the Kingdom of Heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other myserie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, then to shew, that the Region of Eden; in which Paradise was, lay Eastward from Iudea and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwaies called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ouid:

The East wind with Aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabians, and the Persian Hills, Whom Phaëlus first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it be objected, that Hieremie the Prophet threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to be noted, that the North is there named; In respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his Armie was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Pet. Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est (saith he) à prima orbis parte, and afterward he affirmeth, that (à principio, and ad Orientem) haue the same signification; From the beginning & Eastward is all one, à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooffe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegorically followed in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Vers. in these words: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, & good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, & then, put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it & keepe

Verfe 18. keepe it; Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestriall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer, exprelling also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which he calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey neere vnto Charan in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Story of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words: Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Ev a de arbore, non est Ad am, non sunt homines, sed veritas iam fabula est, & omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fontaine, and then no Riuer, if no Riuer, then no such soure heads or branches, and then not any such Riuer as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such Fig-tree, or fruit, or leaues, Eve then did not eate of the fruit, neither was there any Ad am, or any man, the truth was but a Fable, and all things seemed are called backe into Allegories. Words to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon DANIEL: Conticebant eorum deliramenta, qui vmbres & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, vs Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putant Allegoria Legis (se debere subuere, Let the doctrine of them be silent, who following shadows and Images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradise, and the Riuer and the Trees vnder the rules of Allegories).

Ezech 31. 9.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For God gaue Adam free libertie to eate of euery Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eate; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were Enigmaticall or Mysticall, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel speaking of the glory of the Assyrian Kings vseth this speech: *All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him, which proueth both Eden, and Paradise therein seated to be terrestriall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple stile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, then in any other place of Scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulities of future ages, whom he knew (one of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if he had not described both the Region and the Riuer, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the vbleueing Israelites and others after them, would haue misconstrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue beene so often mention made of Paradise in the Scriptures, if the same had beene an Propia?* For we find that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah stood, (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the destruction (which their vnnatural sinne purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar; In like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradise it selfe exceeded in beauty and fertilitie, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a seat and soyle of farre exceeding excellencie.

Gen. 13. 12.

Besides, whence had Homer his inuention of Alcinous Gardens, as Iustin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their prayes of the Elysian fields, but out of the Storie of Paradise? to which also appertaine those Verses of the Golden Age in Ouid:

Ouid. Metam. 1.

Pecora eternum, placidum, tepentibus auris Mullebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

Theioyfull spring did euer last, | Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
And Zephyrus did breede | Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ouid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their Sectators, did greatly enrich their inuentions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conuersions, as if they had bin conceiued out of their owne speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we finde what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the same after wards was diuided into foure branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hauila and Cush, & that all these are Eastward from Canaan, or the Deserts of the Amerites, where Moses wrote, I then conceiue, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for aswell in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the Storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) *Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententia: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligunt: alia eorum, qui spiritaliter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt, (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those which conceiue it altogether spiritall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those, which take it in both senses, which third opinion S. Augustine approoeth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: *Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nomen, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est praeordinatum, (that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and endued with a double forme.

§. IV.

Why it should be needfull to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea, and thence to haue come into India, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous then the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this seat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enuiceth Egypt, and these two Riueres so farre distant, as (except all the World were Paradise) these streames can no way be comprized therein?

Secondly, if the birth and workes, and death of our Sauour, were said to haue beene in some such Countrey, of which no man euer heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would haue taken but a slender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approued witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or giue place to the iudgement of some Writers vpon this place of Gensis (though other wise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour & reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would beleue that there were a piece of the World so set by it selfe & separated, as to hang in the Ayre vnder the circle of the Moone? or who so doltish should fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, & rise vp againe in this our habitable world, & in those places where they are now found? Which lett any man thinke, that I enforce or straine to the worst, these are Peter Comestor his own words. Est autem locus amantissimus, longo terra & maria tractu a nostra habitabili Zona tectus, adu elenatus, vsq; ad lunare globu attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasur place, seuered from our habitable Zone by a long tract of Land and Sea, eleuated so, that it reacheth to the Globe of the Moone.

And Moses Barcephas vpon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quod, respondit volumus, Paradisum multis sublimiore positum esse regione, atq; hac nostra extet terra, qd; fieri

Itt. conuer- ted by Masius.

ut illine per precipitum delabantur flumini tanto cum impetu, quantum verbiis exprimere non possis; eorum impetu impulsis precipitiis, sub Oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus pressantibus ebullicant, in hoc a nobis cultio orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Rivers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried under the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle up in this our habitable World: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this. Ephram dicit Paradisi ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum ita positum esse, ut totius terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunæ cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Navel of this our World, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terre meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, & out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streames & branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appaere by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine seuerall opinions before remembered, by the Truth it selfe; & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no map can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot denie, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beauty: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remayned, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 350. yeares after the Flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remaine the same Rivers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what longitude Paradise lay; & learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into four heads: Now whether the word in the Latine Translation (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those rivers must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the rivers run as they doe, North & South) & therefore these rivers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly knowne, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages know it not, so is there no probability, that eyther these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new Rivers created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills, or deepe Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Sphericall and round bodie, wherein there is no high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is cyrcled by the strength of winde, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Sea. But that there was any winde (whereby the Seas are moit enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a winde to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, vntill the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodnesse, caused the wind to blow, to drey vp the abundant slime and mudde of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vnuholosome mists; and thus we know by experience, that all downe-right raines doe euer more disfigure the violence of outrageous windes, and beat downe, and leuell the swelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equal and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and when there were no Indraughts, Bayes, or Gulles to receiue a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, then that they moued with any ragging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proofe that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Joseph. auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his daies, which Pillars were set vp about 1426. yeares before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred yeares old at the creation of them; and Joseph himselfe, to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeares after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleuee all that he wrote, yet that, which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such Pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auowed. It is also written in Genesis (to whom although I giue little credit, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain, about the Mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Amnius (who commented vpon that inuented Fragment) saith, were to be seene in his daies, who liued in the Reigne of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile; and if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent. For, speaking of this Citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Ciuitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the Citie of Cain, as both our strangers and Merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela, (to whom I giue more credit in these things) that the Citie of Ioppa was built before the Flood, ouer which Cepha was King: whose name with his Brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine Altars of Stone; and it is not vnpossible, that the ruines of this other Citie, called Enoch by Amnius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first Citie of the world, built by Cain, the place, rather then the time, denying it.

And to proue directly, that the flood was not the cause of Mountaines, but that there were Mountaines from the Creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood ouerflowed by fiftene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damasceus (speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Et supra Minyadam excelsum mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo configientes multos sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos; And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine, in Armenia (called Baris) vnto which (as it is said) that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrary to Gods Word, that any more were saued then eight persons (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, knowne by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested: but vntuly, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood: on which the Thalmudists report, that many Giants haued themselves also; but (as Amnius saith) without all authoritie, either Diuine or Humane.

Lastly,

Gen. 1. 11.

Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not so turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this that when Noah sent out the Dove the second time, he returned with an Olive-leaf in his mouth, which he had pluckt, and which (vntill the Trees were discovered) the found not: for otherwise the might have found them floating on the water; a manifest prooffe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the rootes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written; folium Olive, raptum or decerptum, a leafe pluckt, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to teare off. By this it is apparent, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to reach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouerie.

§. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to be the fountain of these foure Rivers.

Gen. 1. 8.
Ab. 17. 16.

Gen. 1. 31

3. 2. 2

His conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I wil in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Nouemagus, Adrianus, Coropius Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many words, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this vniuersalitie will appeare altogether improper. The places which Adrianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule over euery Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one bloud all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee was Lord and Gouernor, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse: Now although all men were of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams Posteritie inhabited in proceffe of time ouer all the face of the Earth, yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and culiue, in which hee liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had beene no other choice, but that Adam had bin left to the vniuersall; Moses would not then haue said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath not East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God beene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the vniuersall had beene Paradise? for then must Adam haue beene chased also out of the World. For if All the Earth were Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction then this, That Adam was driven out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except we should beleue with Me- trodorus, that there were infinite Worlds. Which to denie, he thinks all one, as to as- firme, That in so large a field, as the vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. NOU- EMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was vnpossible for those three Ri- uers, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which water three portions of the World so farre distant) to rise out of one fountaine, except the Ocean be taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Rivers, being so vnderstood, there could be no con- iecture more probable; but it shall plainly appeare, that Piscon was falsely taken for Gan- ges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, although Ganges be a River by Hamilah in India, and Ni- lus run through Ethiopia. The Seuentic write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the er- rors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Nouemagus, Coropius, and Adrianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture farre more probable, then that of Ephrem, Cyrillus, and Athanasius: That Paradise was seated farre beyond the Ocean so Sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the Country in which he was created, and was buried at Mount Caluary in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the Flood, yet Adams thin-bones must haue contayned a thousand sadome, and much more, if he had forded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disproue it.

§. VII.

§. VII.

Of their opinion, which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

Hardly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoole-men affirme, Paradise to be a place, altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceiued, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted about the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Orbe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoole-men charge Beda withall, yet Pererius layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus: and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographie of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neereft heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates; but neyther of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood: who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heauen it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Arcopagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleueed in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end filled death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Deuill himselfe doe him that right, as by an O- racle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and S. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Eusebius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place ex- ceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrotholus) which being about all Clouds of Raine, or other inconuenience, the people (by rea- son of their so many years) are called Macrobius (that is) Long-lived. A further Ar- gument is vsed, for prooffe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch pre- served from the violence of the flood: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued, that the blessed Soules were preserved till the last iudgement; which Irenaeus, and Iustine Martyr also beleueed. But this opinion was of all Catholicque Diuines reprobued, and in the Florentine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement: Sicut certum est. Enoch et ELIAM nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt: an in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue: so where they now liue, in Pa- radise or elsewhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephas giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessarie that Paradise should be set at such a di- stance and height, because the foure Rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and af- terward haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreames haue beene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing vpon this subiect: of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly be iudged a vanitie in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alleaged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being fet so neere the Moone, it had beene too neere the Sunne, and other heauenly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue beene too ioynt a Neighbour to the Element of fire. Thirdly, because the ayre in that Region is so violently moued, and carried a- bout with such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betweene the Earth and the Moone (according to Ptoleme and Alfaganus) is seuentene times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes a grosse ac- count about one hundred and twentie thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a Basis and foundation. But had it bin so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the know- ledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions Tertullian addeth this, that those people which dwell nere those falls of waters, are deafe from their infancy, like those which dwell nere the Citadape, or over-falls of Nilus. But thus I hold as fained. For I have scene in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling nere them, are not deafe at all. Tertullian (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Rafael and Ambrose together: to which Petrus Sed ego hac apud Rafaelum & Ambrosium in cor scriptis, que nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; but I doe not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things, either in Basil or Ambrose.

Ecclesiastes 15: 26, 27.

1 Peter 3: 20.

But for the bodies of Enoch & Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking vp might be into the celestially Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch & Elias, was eatie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth, saving eight persons, and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

Gen. 7: 19.

Exod. 14: 22.

For Tertullian his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleued that Paradise was raised above the middle Region of the Aire, and twentie cubits above all Mountaines, that the flood did not therfore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it): this is also contrarie to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flooded all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Mafius, Damasenus, & the Thalmadists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saved themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not naturall, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleued, that Paradise was so seated, as Beda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacie and beautie so resembled. But thus I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better reach all their Followers to blist, then to resolute, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tertullian, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountaines of Sinay, Ararat, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both Springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the alhes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence waite off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Plinie himselfe, who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrarie. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradise; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thinne (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, hauing therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Those which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradise vnder the Æquinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonauenture, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heate, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa), for although Paradise could not bee vnder the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to be condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that wheras

it appeared, that euerie Countrey, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Æquinoctiall, did so much the more exceede in heat: It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countreies which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vnhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed vnhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neerer to the line it selfe. For hercof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discerned. Indeede it hath so pleased God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a fure off, are found by triall and the witness of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fallion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith Isaiah) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Æquinoctiall line, or neerer it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Eastland wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot so much matter it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interpolation of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seen, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Onely there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fontaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both Greene and ripe, as it may of all other places be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vnclodeth and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered Husband Tertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countreies called Terræ viuosæ, Viciou Countreies: for Nature being liberrall to all without labour, necessitie imposing no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits then vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolemen were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calefrya, there is a Countrey in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Esa. 37. and Ezech. 27.

These opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor vnder Terridæ Zona; it followeth that now we discover and finde out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficultie of which search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names, so with their Masters, so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as well ancient as moderne.

Besides, we find that the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and few other excepted) sought to extinguiish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turks hath sought (what he could) to extinguiish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; which he hath subiect and intrahled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way, which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all other the most beautiful and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to Judea Eastward was Arabia Petraea, but in this region was Moses himselfe when he wrote: and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuer, as are expresse to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must bee Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by 10 its selfe, and by the fertility, & the riuer only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries. In these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabsakeh: Hane the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESFID, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, the merchants of Sheba, & Albur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, we must vnderstand that there were 2. Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapollitan: the second part that Valley 20 called Auenis, otherwife Conuallis, or the tract of Chamath, where Affyria is ioyned to Arabia the Desert, & where Ptolemie placeth the City of Aueria: & the third is knowne by the name of Domus Edenu, or Calcfyria, otherwife Pallus cana, or the hollow Valley, because the mountaines of Tibanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cocle in Greeke is Cana in Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince lye East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnkowne to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleueed this Calcfyria to be the lme which Moses describeth. For the lme cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beza, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise, though to 30 giue Herodotus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, saying, That hee sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether misvnderstood two of the four Riuer, (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea; we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAYAH) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Albur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the 40 people for many Iles. And it hath euer bene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issius, now Liazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had commerce, and also what commodities euerie Countrey yielded: and hauing counted the fuerall People and Countries, he addeeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of things, in rayments of blue silke, and of broydered workes, fine linnen, corall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: They were merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faires, with the chiefe of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yeeld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yeelded; and and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbours of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terradan (built or enlarged by Nabuchodonozor, now called Balsara) thence sent vp all these rich merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited 10 farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into fower heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hierosolymitanus thinkes it to be Ctesiphon, but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I meane on the East-side of Tigris, for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenite vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to be the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Deserts of Palmirena: for these people 20 of Canneh (afterward Schenite) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the bankes of Euphrates, as far as the Citie of Thapsacus, where Ptolemie appointed the Pords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenite by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercautoribus ex Syria Seleucia & Babyloniam euntibus iter per Schenites; The Merchants which traualle fro Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For 30 Charran, to which Abraham came from Ur in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia, not vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) they of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Albur, & Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran which is sometime called Charre, and Haran, and Aran, is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; and when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia: or Aran flumini, the Greeke word (Mesopotamia) importing, a Country between Riuer: for At for in Greeke, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos flumini; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the City it selfe, to which Abraham came from Ur (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that tract of Land from the borders of Calcfyria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenite, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, & were in after-ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabit Batanea, and the North part 40 of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the vnhabited Solitude of Palmirena. which lyeth betwene Syria, and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, and were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (witnesseth Appian); and so Rabanus Maurus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the name by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne: of which name there are two other Cities, standing in Triangle with Seleucia, and almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe canne, and Minn-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia, and the other 50 opposite vnto it, where these Riuer of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioine. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canne was, (being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar) it is vncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine seat thereof, that so many other Cities did retaine a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnlikely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canne, were but to make difference betwene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canne, or betwene Canne the old, and the new: which additions to distinguish Cities by, are ordinarie in all the Regions of the World.

14.1. Judges speaketh thereof in these words: Cumq; reuerterentur, perueniunt ad Charan, quæ est in medio itinere contra Nininum, undecim die; When they returned, they came to Charan, (which is the mid-way against Ninive) the eleventh day.

Ad. 7. 1. This Citie is by the Martyr Stephen named Charan (speaking to the high Priest:) Te Men, Bethren, et Patres, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charan. But the seat of this Citie is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembered in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and ouerthrow of Crausus the Romane, who for his insatiable greediness was called Gorgias auaritia; The gulfie of auarice. Whereof Lucan:

With Roman blood th' Affryan Carre he defil'd.

But this Citie Canne or Chalae is made manifest by Moses himselfe, where it is written of Nimrod: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Erech, & Acad, & Chalne, in the land of Shinar or Shinar, where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what Cities and People were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the fild Valley of Shinar or nere it; and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract, afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldea, into which also Eden stretcheth it selfe. Chaldea, Babylonia, Shinar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR). Three names of one Countrie: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel; & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. 20 And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proued in the eleventh Chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Playne Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Gen. 11. 2.

Now Shinar being Babylonia, and Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrods greatnes, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneth to Babylonia, which also Ezechiel completh with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants, which traded with the Tyrians: and Esay in the threats of Senacherib against Iherusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Telassar. But be- 30 fore to conclude where Eden it selfe lyeth, it is necessarie to describe, those other Countreies, which Ezechiel ioyneth therewith in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Morouer the sonnes of HAM were CUSH, &c. And the sonnes of CUSH were SEBA, and HAVILAH, and SABTAH, and RAAMAH, &c. And the sonnes of RAAMAH were SHEBA, &c. and anon after, CUSH begat NIMROD: so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah: though some there are that conceiue to the contrarie, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and vnderstanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His brother Raamah or Regma tooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward 40 the Sea side and Persian gulfie (called afterward Raama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sons, which possessed it.) For (saith EZECHIEL) the merchants of Raamah and Sheba were thy men chanta, they occupied in thy Faies with the chiefe of all pices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Countrie, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall out, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the confining Countrie Strabo calleth

Gen. 10. 7.

Strabo, l. 16.

Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered; which people haue an interchange trade with Elana, lying on the East side of the Persian gulfie. By this it appeareth who were the Shebeans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and said to haue bene the Merchants of Tyre, for gold, pices, and precious stones: of which they had not onely plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromatiques, and other proper commodities. For as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persia ora initio Insula est, in qua multis & pretiosissimones gignuntur: in alijs vero, clari & perclucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulfie, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred: and in other, verie cleare and shining stones. Now, the difference between Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech), and Sheba with (Schin;) but but whatsoever the difference may be in the Hebrew Orthographie, their Countreies and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea and Saba (whence the Queene of Saba;) neighboured the Red Sea; and so that place of the 72. Psalm: expounded, Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Shebe & Saba.

The Shebeans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, past vp the Countrey, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the Cities of Charan, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and Northwest: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east. Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldean Paraphrast, which Countrie by the Geographers is called Coromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews also often vs.

Thus much of those Countreies which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Telassar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Telassar lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyris. Now to make these things the more plaine, we must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many parts of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly disioyned.

For it appeareth both in Esay the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabshake, the while the Armie of Affysia lay before Iherusalem, that the Cities of Gosan, Naran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Telassar, had resisted the Affysians, though by them (in a sort) mastered and recovered. Hane the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, as Gosan, and Naran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. But it appeared manifestly after Senacheribs death, that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Ezar-Haddon held Affysia, and Moradach Baladan, Babylonia. And after that the Armie of Senacherib, commanded by Rabshake which lay before Iherusalem (Ezechias then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angell of God destroyed: the King of Babel sent for Ezechias, both to congratulate the recouerie of his health, and his victory obtained ouer the Affysians. After which ouerthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slaine by his owne sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Ezar-Haddon succeeding him in Affysia. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Moradach, Ezechias shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which inuited the Kings of Babylon afterward to vndertake their conquest and subuerfion. So as, the suspition of warre encreasing betwene Babylon and Affysia, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Affysia, were employed to beare off the incursions of the 40 Affysians; and their Garrison-place was at Telassar: and the very word (Telassar saith Iunius, signifying as much, as a Bulwarke against the Affysians. This place Herodotus takes for Resem, others for Selenia: but this Telassar is the same, which Am. Marcellinus in the Historie of Iulian (whom he followed in the enterprize of Persia) calleth Talibna in stead of Telassar, who describeth the exceeding strength thereof in his 24. Booke: It is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a steepe and vnsittable Rocke, in so much as the Emperour Iulian durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garrison against the Affysians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Countrey adioyning were lodged to defend the same. This place Ptolemie calleth Teridata, hauing Reseph (which he calleth Resepha) on the left hand, and Canneh, (which he calleth Thelle-Canne) on the right hand, not farre from whence is also found the Citie of Mann-canne vpon Tigris, and all these seated together, as Esay and Ezechiel haue sorted them. But the vnderstanding of these places is the more difficult, because Affysia (which the Chaldeans call Aturia) and Mesopotamia, were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Affysia & Mesopotamia in Babylonia nomen transierunt (saith NIGER.) Affysia and Mesopotamia tooke the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named, in what part of the World Eden is seated, scated, as, by Charran or Hararin Mesopotamia: also by Canehe and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vatablus, who in these words translateth this place: Plantauerat autem Ιησοῦς Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is: (saith he in his Annotations.) Iussit nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabie & Mesopotamie, He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

§. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia, which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, and Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some further light for the prooue of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the River Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the River of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozoria (as it were, the Island, by an eminencie.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doublelesse) remaine to this day, though in the rest of the Region fo called this name be swallowed vp, with the fame of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldea. This Island of Eden hath vp the River, and not farre beyond it, the Citie of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fortis Petra: below it, it hath Mosul or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not about twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mosul or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim. Ciuitates sunt Dorbeta prope Taurum montem, quæ nunc Mosel dicitur; magna sane, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities, Dorbeta neere vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Dorbeta (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimonie of Masius informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mosul (or Mosal) is in the Confinnes of Mesopotamia and Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, and in the neighbor-hood of Ninive; and that it is the famous Seleucia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosal (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Ninive; Of all the Cities & Townes which are about the Citie of Mosal (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Ninive. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a Citie thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change S into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not farre off Seleucia) for Seleucia, so be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosul, and that ancient Citie, which Ptolomie and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Ninive, Philostratus, and Simعان Sethi, Mosula, and Iohn Lean Mosal, others Mosel, (thought hee not the same with Mosul) is set but a little higher vpon the same River of Tigris, neere Mosul: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden hereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it about Mosul, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is vpon the same River of Tigris.

The onely difficultie is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a River of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning heere, we haue a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a River of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue beene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after after the flood called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris, betwene Mount Taurus, and Seleucia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Ethiopic maketh mention, (not that latter Ethiopic, Disciple of Callimachus, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenas called Istri, who liued in Aegypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of Greeke by Saint Ierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Ethiopic, Adonis for Edenis; yet Adonis being a River of Phœnicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Ethiopic. For Ethiopic makes it a Countrey, and not a River, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Ethiopia, calling the land of Chus Ethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint. And lastly, the River which watereth the Regions, (saith Ethiopic) falleth into the Gulf of Persia: which River he calleth Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnesse thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their original: for out of Eden came a River, or Rivers, to water the Garden, both which Rivers (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traueise Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertilitye. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia, and the excellent fertilitye thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Sirabo) the leaues are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Spring.

Also STEPHANVS de uerbis mentioneth the Citie of Adama vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East, but of Eden in Caldeya. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discouery, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Rivers which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Persis were Tigris and Euphrates, it is agreed by all: for the Seuentie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates & Hiddekel Tigrim omnes exponunt: & almen vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris (saith Vatable.) And because that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIVS (ad verbum) hath conuered them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queene Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Seleucia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the River of Tigris; hauing no sufficient authority to choosethemselues a Patriarch (which cannot bee done without foure or three Metropolitan Bishops at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselues had made: hauing three hundred years before that vpon the like Elect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (who of a couetous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitan Bishops, when the places fell void) they all assembled themselues together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had beene of one House and Family to the preiudice of the Church, and thit there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, who aspired to the same dignitie which his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon which occasion, and for the choise of a Gouernour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselues. The words of the 50 generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Per nos non acceptauimus nec proclamauimus ipsum, sed subito conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus, & ex omnibus Ciuitatibus & pagis quæ sunt circum Ciuitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur, in vicinia Ninive, ex Babylonia, ex Charrha, ex Arbella, ex Insula quæ est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persia, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Ninive, & out of Babylon, Carraha, Arbella, and out of the Island which lyeth in the middle of Tigris, gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they use these words: Neg. super sunt apud nos Caterisque, quorum est ordinare Catholicum, sed soli panti Episcopi, Episcopus Arbele, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adarbagan, en vesigio continemus in Insulam, que est intra Tigrim flumen, Eden, secundum compactionem inter nos, &c. (which is) Neither are there remaining among us any Metropolitan Bishops to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but only a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbele, the Bishop of Salmasius, and the Bishop of Adarbagan: but so, we assembled speedily in the land Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed between our selves, &c.

Now this land of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better understood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, and Coptis, he goeth on in these words: *Max audita illius morte, concurrebant turbamini in itam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum milibus supra Asofal positam, decem fere milia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undique cincta, & a paucis alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that land of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which land is situated about twelue miles about Asofal, containing very nere ten miles in compasse, and enerie where it is inclosed with a wall, inhabited by a few other men then Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hofan-cephe, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra predictam Tigris Insulam rupi aspera impositam; Above the aforesaid land of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this land of Geserta, Andrew T heuer maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these words: Geserta ou Gesire est au milieu de la riuire du Tigre, & perse que c'est une terre des feriles de toute l'Asie, Geserta or Gesire is in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.*

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden which lieth Eastward from Arabia Petraea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the ascription of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Caneh, and Charran and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Affryia and Babylonia, where the Edemites in Tibelsar were garrifond to resist the Affryians, whose displantation Senacherib vaunted of (as aboue written) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Eufrates, two of the knowne Riuer of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. X I.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuer to rise from one stream.

BE it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuer went out of Eden, and not Riuer, in the plurall, which scruple Matthæus Beroaldus hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these words: *Et flumius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, quinque diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Que verba melius consentiunt cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddatur. Et flumius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) flumij procedebat ex Edene regione ad irrigandum pomarium, & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: which words (saith Beroaldus) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuer was going forth of Eden (that is) Riuer went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard, and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigrine differs from the Vulgar or Latine, for it conuers it thus: Et flumius egrediebatur de delicijs, And a Riuer went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, *Et flumius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuer went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence, was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuer) for Riuer, it is vsual among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seed, the fruitful Tree, &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees): And thirdly, He man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God, in medio ligni Paradisi, in the middle of the Tree of the Garden, for (Trees): And of this opinion is David Kimi, and Yatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and hee giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuer (for Riuer) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, bee giuen to the objection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuer, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I denie not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, we may expound the foure heads, to bee foure notable passages into famous Countries. And so we may take the word (Riuer) Verse the tenth for one Riuer (to wit) Eufrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuer, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bin, diuides it selfe, & ere long yeldeth foure notable passages into seuerall Countries, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuer downward, there is conueynance into the Countries named in the Text, though part of the way to one of the Countries (to wit, to Affryia) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuer of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or waltheth the whole Region of Affryia, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Affryia. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigri vnder Apamia, whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigri, (as it were) Piso-tigri. This leadeth to the Land of Hanila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which in Historians is Nabar-jares or Narrages, for Nahar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatum (a Riuer deriued), also Acracanus, quasi Ranofus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seat of Chus, about the borders of Chaldea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldea. The third branch, Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddekel properly so called (that is, into Tigri) about Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigri into Affryia: where, becaufe at length it is called Hiddekel, or Tigri, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Eufrates, so called per excellentiam, being the bodie of the Riuer Eufrates, which runneth through Babylon and Otris. But, be it a Riuer, or Riuer, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigri and Eufrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuer; for that Perath is Eufrates, there can be no question; and (indeed) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigri. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moses) Eastwards towards Assur, as we find, that Tigri is the Riuer of Affryia proprie dicta, whose chiefe Citie was Ninive, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Ninive, which was the chiefe Citie of Affryia.

And as for the kind of speech here used in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuer be (properly) their Fountains, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aquæ (saith Vlstanus) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; si ex fonte nascitur, fons, si ex flumine, vel ex lacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water be out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuer any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new banks, there is that part of the Riuer, where the branch forsaketh the maine streame, called the head of the Riuer.

¶ XII.

Of the strange fertilitye and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

Tmay also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitye and beautie, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitye and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaketh of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Ninive, and so from Atfal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Urbis Ninive sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima quid, &c. Where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated, This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and he addeth afterward: Cereus autem singulis perorando adio serax est, ut nunquam non fere ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) Is so fruitful in bringing forth Corne, that it yeldeth two hundred fold. The leanes of Wheate and barley being almost foure fingers broad: As for the height of Millet and Sefame, they are euen in length like vnto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Fig Trees. Thus saith Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellencie, which is, that it yeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum consunt; Of which the people make Brad, Wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremite findeth a list commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kind of fine Flaxe, of which people make their Garments, and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships; and that this is true, Albanus in the life of Antonius the Eremite, confesseth, saying: That he received a Garment made thereof from the Eremite himselfe, which he brought with him out of this Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as indeede the Earth yeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith Strabo) passim per omnem Regionem Palme sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Euntibus a parie lana Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis, regio campestris interit inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut a passu repellit pecora dicantur, ne satietas perimat; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia ( famous for plentie of sweet Odours) there lyeth a Champaigne Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitful and fat a soile, that they are said to drine their Cattel from pasture, lest they should perish by satietie. Bis in anno fecetes Babylony fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeare (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, then in the Northerne parts: so we may iudge the excellencie of this by that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Eden, or a part thereof; his words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hac regio frugibus & arboribus abundat mansuetis itemq; semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruits, & Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer vp of Nature in a perpetuall actiuitie. In briefe, so great is the fertilitye of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to eate them vp with Sheep: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first fortie yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare Seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith (saith Plinie) who addeeth this singularitye to that soile, That the second yeere the very stubble (or rather falling downe of the feedes againe) yeldeth them a Haruest of Corne without any further labour: his words are these: Perbata tanta sunt, ut sequente anno sponte resibilis fiat seges.

¶ XIII.

Of the River Pison, and the Land of Hauilah.

After the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitye thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris, and Euphrates. For that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuer should trouble so many wise men it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuer of Eden, which water Paradis, which Riuer or Riuer Moses witnesseth afterward, diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon, &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, then when we finde both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia, to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two Riuer as farre distant, as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plaine, that these Riuer were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason and Experience bearing witness.

There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to bee singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention, and jangling: not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or sectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherish such weak babes, as their owne inuentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking (and first for the Riuer of Pison) seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah, which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cush, and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Iofan, the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradis the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Noah, and his sonnes after the flood. For the sonnes of Cush were Seba, Hauilah, Sabab, and Ramah, and the sonnes of Iofan were Ophir, and Hauilah, &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Iofan, that land of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and famous Riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges, hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which Riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure Riuer, named by Moses, must of necessity be foure of the greatest in the world; wheace (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous Riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this Riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another Riuer, whom in these respects they should rather haue chosen then Ganges; for the Riuer Indus on this side India, for beautie, for neerenesse, & for abilitie, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus cometh betwene it and Tigris? and betwene Tigris and Indus is all that huge Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, further towards the East, and beyond Indus, are all those ample Dominions of India in a Ganges, which lie betwene those two proud Riuer of Indus and Ganges not called the Kingdom of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is remoued from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges; which falleth into the Ocean, less then fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, whosoer readeth the storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no Riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspes was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander thereon in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie, and in sayling downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof so great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleete, which was ready to bee swallowed vp therein: Hydaspes (as afore said) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great great as it, having besides this, the Rivers of Coas, of Snaflus, Acefines, Adris (otherwife Hirovis, Hispalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, and by it are swallowed vp with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one streame, it croffeth athwart Asia, and then at Cambaia vifiteth the Ocean Sea.

But becaufe Pifon, which compaffeth Hauilah, as alfo Gehon, which watereth Cufh, muft fome where be ioyned with the reft in one bodie, or at leaft be found to proceede out of the fame Countrie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede, out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus rifeth in the vtermolt of the South, and runneth Northward into the Mediterran Sea; and the River Ganges rifeth out of the Mountaine Imaus, or (as others will haue it) Caucafus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the other not farre off in the fame Armenia, by the Gordiean Mountaines, fo as Ganges, who onely trauiileth in her owne India, and Nilus through Aethiopia and Aegypt, neuer faw the land of Eden, or ioyned themfelves in one channell, either with themfelves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be feparated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Mofes.

Gen. 2. 12.

Therefore the River Pifon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the fame which by ioyning it felfe with Tigris, was therefore called Pifis-tigris, or Pifo-tigris, of Pifon and Tigris, which River watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cufh gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, fo called of Hauilah the Sonne of Iofan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East. And this Hauilah of the Cufhites had alfo Gold, Bdelium, and the Onyx ftone. This Bdelium is a Tree, of the bigneffe of an Oliue, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeldeth a certaine gum fweet to fmel to, but bitter in tafte, called alfo Bdelium. The Hebrewes take the Load-ftone for Bdelium. Beroaldus affirmeth, that Bdela in Hebrew fignifieth Pearle: fo doth Engubinus; and Hierome calls it Oleafter: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Sufiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Sufiana or Hauilah ftretcheth it felfe toward the North, as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Perfian Gulfe, on the East fide thereof: from which East fide had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold, which Strabo alfo wittneffeth, as was fhewed before.

Struck.

Hof. 2. 2.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbins take it for Nilus. Aben-ezra (fayth Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, tranflateth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the fame impoffibility that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Hellefpont and all Asia the leffe, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Hauilah or Sufiana, doth to this day retainne fome figne of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioyned and compounded name, and are called Pifo-tigris. And it is ftrange vnto me, that from fo great antiquitie there fhould be found remaining any refembling found of the firft name by the name of Bandas, as by Poitellus, by Caffaldus, of Baldach: by Baris, of Bagdad; and of Bonghedor, by Andrew Theut; and yet all thofe that haue lately fene it, call it Bagdet. To this River of Pifon, Ptolomie indeede with many others giue the name of Bafilius or Regius, and Gehon they terme Mahar-fares and Marfaw, and Barfares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinie called Prixrates: by Iunius, Puckperah, out of the Hebrew (that is) The profufion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus, it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaranda: the Hebrewes Perath, (fayth Ab. Montanus): Pagninus, Perath; Iofephus, Phorab; Eufebius, Zozimus: Ammianus, Chalyemicus: Gifilanus, and Colinus terme it Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Affrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Nabor Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frat.

The fame confufion of names hath Tigris, as Diglitio, and Diglash, Scilax, and Sol-lax: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel: now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genefis conceiueth rightly of thefe Rivers: for Euphrates and Tigris (fayth he) ftreamed into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reafon, why thefe two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) lofe their names, and are called Pifis-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguiſhed, is, becaufe the beft part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, finketh into the Lakes of Chaldea not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham, and fall not intirely into the Perfian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pifon doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was firft broched by Iofephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weedes) and other men (who take his authoritie to be fufficient in matter of defcription, whereupon depended no other important conſequence (were not curious in the examination thereof). For Epiphanius, Anguſtine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was tranſported into the Eaſt India, to find out Hauilah: fo was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compaffe Aethiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Mofes ſpeaketh in the defcription of Paradiſe, be found to be a Region, adjoining to Babylon on the one fide, and Cufh (which is falſly interpreted Aethiopia) faſtened to it on the other fide, wee ſhall not neede then to worke wonders (that is) to impoſe vpon men the tranſportation of Rivers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vſes) were made to tranſport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cufh the Sonne of Ham firſt fate downe with his fonnes Shebah, Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the fonne of Cufh, did that Region take name, which Pifon compaffeſh; and the land (called Cufh) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cufh himſelfe. For as the fonnes of Iofan, Ophir and Hauilah, ſeated themſelves as neere together as they could in India, fo did the fonnes of Cufh in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was firſt Chufia of Cufh; then Chufa, Sufa, and Sufiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Deſerts of Sur, did the Iſraelites and Amalechites poſſeſſe all the interient Countries: for Saul ſmote the Amalechites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldean Paraphraſt conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea; but this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the Eaſt India, for Saul was no ſuch traualier or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah muſt be found neerer home, where the fonnes of Iſmael inhabited, and which countrie Saul waſted: for Amalec & the Amalechites poſſeſt that necke of Countrie, betwene the Perfian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the Eaſt, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the Weſt, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South and they ſped themſelves with the Midianites and Edumians, from the Eaſt part, or backe fide of the Holie Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprifing the beſt part of Arabia Petraea and Deſerta.

¶ XIII.

Of the River Gehon and the Land of Cufh: and of the ill tranſlating of the Aethiopia for Cufh, 2. C. HIRON. 21. 16.

Now, as Hauilah in the Eaſt India drew Pifon fo farre out of his way thither, fo I ſay did Cufh (being by the Senenite tranſlated Aethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cufh being taken for Aethiopia by the Greekes whom the Latines followed, Gehon conſequently was eſteemed for Nilus. But Aethiopians are, as much, as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countreies called Thebaides, lying to the Southward of all Aegypt. And although there be many other Regions of Aethiopians, and farre South in Africa, yet thoſe of Thebaides are thoſe fo often remembred in the Aegyptian ſtores, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Aegypt: all which Aethiopians are very neere, or diſt directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chufites; who are neither blacke of colour, nor in any fort neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this tranſlation of the Septuagint, Pererius doth qualifie in this manner: There are (ſayth he) two Aethiopia's, the Eaſt, and the Weſt: and this diſtinction he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now becauſe there is no colour to make Chus Aethiopia in Africa, Pererius will make Chufh and the land of the Chufites (which is Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to bee the Eaſt Aethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Cufh and the land of the Chufites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitanit Iſmael ab Hauilah vſq; Sur, quereſpiciat Gen. 25. 18.

Aegyptum

Ægyptus introcuntibus Affyrios; ISMAEL dwelt from Hamilah unto Sur, that is, towards Ægypt, as thou goest toward Affyria; The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot bee Nilus, but a River which watereth Cush, and not Æthiopia. But this place of scripture, Habitant ISMAEL, &c. hath this sense: Ismael dwelt from Hamilah, which is the way of Affyria, or the Countrey bordering Affyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Ægypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions betwene the border of Ægypt and Affyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplyed, it well appeared, when Zaarab the Chusite, which others call Tharamba, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Æthiopia beyond Ægypt; for that had bene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Ægypt, betwene Palästina and Æthiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalechites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For it is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, hee in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zaarab round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Cite of the Æthiopians, it cannot bee suspected: for these bee the wordes of the Scripture disproofing it: And ABRAHAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betwene Cadell and Sur, and Iouanan in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first fir for their feete after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalechites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene wearie, and vnable to redit. Again, in the storie of Isaac it is written: Therefore ISAAC went to ABIMELECH, and the Philistines vnto Gerar: And I am sure Abimelech and the Philistines were no Æthiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where hee describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these words: Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: by Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazala towards the South. But indeed, howeuer Pererius doth with an honest excuse false his translation of Chus for Æthiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misvnderstand this place. And first, for *Homer*s East and West Æthiopia, they are both found elsewhere. For Plinie in his first Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Æthiopia's. But the East Æthiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Ægypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Pesser Iohn; And the West Æthiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the River Niger, which wee call Senega and Gambra: for thereabouts are these Æthiopians called Perorsi, Daraites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Africa, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Pesser Iohn, and the Trogodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Æthiopia, which is beyond Ægypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, vvhich hee hath of Moses when hee serued Pharao, in the warres against the Æthiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Æthiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Ægypt, and setteth it in Æthiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation. Again, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Pererius confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet HEREMIE; And what hast thou now to doe in the way of Ægypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quid tibi vis in via Ægypti, vbi bibas aquam Gehon? to this saith PERERIVS, professing Hebraice ibi non est vox Gehon, sed Sicbor, qua significat nigrum & turbidum; True (saith PERERIVS) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sicbor, which significeth blacke and troubled water.

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnaueritable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Æthiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethro, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Æthiopiassim, as (with Iosephus) the Geneua conuerts it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Zipporah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia.

Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea, for it is written in the second of Exodus, that Moses fled from PARAO into the Land of Madian, and sat downe by a Well, &c. and againe, in the third of Exodus: When Moses kept the sheepe of IETHRO his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indee, these foure nations are cury where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusedly together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of those names, and sometimes by another, as in Gen. 37. v. 25, 27, & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36. it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharao's Steward. The Geneuians, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion, he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians, & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them, when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery and Balme, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia Felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense, and their Spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39. Chap. it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites, which the Chaldean Paraphrast in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this the more manifest, it is written in the sixth of Iudges, That when Israel had sowne, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites and Amalekites are made one Nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites onely are named, as comprehending both Nations; and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that euery man would giue him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. thickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were agreed and valiant Nation, and euery inaction of warre. Mannus cunctis contra omnes, & manus omnium contra eum; His hand (saith God of ISMAEL) shall be against all men, and euery mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schemite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Æthiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparant, in the second of Chronicles, in these words: So the Lord stirred up against IERORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Æthiopians; So Microm reads it: the Gencua translation hath it, which were besides the Æthiopians. Now, how far it is off betwene the Philistines, and the Negro's, or the Æthiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe & ioine with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Æthiopia about two and thirte, or three & thirte degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Ægypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue bene translated in these words: *So the Lord stirred up against IERORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeede are their next neighbours. * Nulla superest dubitatio quin Æthiopia in Sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Steuchius) but Æthiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia.*

Now may we thinke it is probable, or possible, that Moses could beignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man so well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the River (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharao) a River of Ægypt, where in he was borne & bred, & wrought so many miracles. Besides, the River of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the

C. 23. v. 3.
C. 25. v. 18.

Israelites, that Nilus had bene a Riuer of Paradise, they might iustly haue thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor any memory, or speech thereof; except we shall beleue the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie), there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in stead of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Esay, & once in the Prophet Hieremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a Riuer of Ethiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Ethiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites, and Madianites: who being often gouerned 10 by many little Kings, or hegals, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Calefyrians, with the Mogogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Ierusalem it selfe was with-held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost him- 20 selfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Ri- uers, and call them Gehon, and Pison; to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah, for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Ri- uers he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desart.

And as he well proued that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus, so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth faire East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more then twenty Englilh miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mis- 30 taken. They all considered of the habitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, & neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe with his sonnes first inhabited. Hauilah tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hauilah, (now Sustiana): Ra- amah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia felix. NIMROD seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldaea, and in proesse of time, and as 40 their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Ar- abian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites re- mained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus Ethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if wee doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whoseoeuer else that first peopled this Iland, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and calling the Iland after his name Britannia, it might bee said that Thames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia: and when afterwards in proesse of time, the same Brute had also dis- 50 couered and conquered Scotland, which hee also intituled by the same name of Britan- nia, after ages might conclude that Scotland was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or lets vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus, and that the first discoverers thereof arriued in the mouth of some Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as hee first discovered, shall wee in like sort resolve that France, Spain, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them? in like manner was it said by Moses in his de- scription of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which

which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabite, feeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue bene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For (though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, A- cad, and Chalne, yet we find, that his Successours within a few yeeres after commanded all the whole World in effect: and the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chus. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnelle of that Empire founded by Nimrod a yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places nor yet entituled, and further from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeeres after the Flood had (as it were) fortified, with Thickets, and permitted euery Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree to ioyne themselves (as it were) into one mayne body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that euery Family seated themselves as neare together as possible they could, and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times resort, and succour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength vsurped do- minion ouer the rest, sate downe in the very confluence of all those Riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repay- red; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increase. The first Father of men Adam, had therein his former ha- bitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the yongest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as afore- said) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleansed and enriched; so did Hauilah place 30 himselfe vpon Piso-Tigris: Raamah and his sonne Sheba farther downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe vpon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Riuers sides: for Nimue, Charran, Reseph, Canneb, Er in Chaldaea, and the other first-peopled Cities were all founded vpon these nauigable Ri- uers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the o- ther, as is already often remembred.

§. XV.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

40 BUT now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram sinuorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this faid soile and temper, then the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and la- 50 bour of man. For wherein foueuer the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they haue excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giuech vnto man whatsoeuer his life beggett at Natures hand. And though it may be said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetual Spring and Summer, yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefits the fearful and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of veni- mous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconueniences, and then there will be found no comparison betwene the one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all living men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuersall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-lighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, about the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others as farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Cattles in the Ayre, and in mens fancies, vainly imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of India, that God planted this Garden, which Eden wee finde in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A Riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioine in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah according to Moses: the true seates of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pisón was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the contrary: for that which was neuer ioined, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the Riuer of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie, and this Riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris & Euphrates, then Ganges is: for although there are betwene Tigris and Ganges about foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauielleth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, three score and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographicall description of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntill such time as this description of mine be reproued by a better.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

§. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

Or eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradise, in exilium via temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also deliuered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum vitarum, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a proprietie, to preferue both the growing, sensitiue, and rationall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also giuen a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and thus, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last.

And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could be immortall, but that it must once perill and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures,

Man

Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyed thereby a long, healthfull, and vngriued life: after which (according to the opinion of most Diuines) he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres; and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of beleefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisedome of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Mankind; or else, that millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortalitie of bodies, which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisedome is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life, and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouercommeth, to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestially. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery Tree faire to the sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, scale the inuention of the created World; so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortalitie; and therefore said to bee the meate and drinke of the gods.

¶ II.

Of Becanus's his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed further, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, whereto Goropius much maruaileth. But as hee had an inuentive braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleued better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, howsoeuer his opinion may be valued, yet hee vsurpeth the praise due to others, at least if the inuention be at that price at which hee setteth it. For Moses Bar-cephas fastened on this coniecture about sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-cephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith hee would induce other men to that beleefe. For Moses Bar-cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Acisines, one of the Ri- uers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Floete of Gallies in, or neere the Kingdome of Porsus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, sempex serens; Alwaies planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches ponding downewards, & leaues no lesse then a shield. Aristobolus Aristobolus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselves vnder one of these Trees. Omsierius rayseth this number to four hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie and Omsierius confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may bee, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiueth, who because hee found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and let it by the Riuer Acclines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue scene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner, After they are first shot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, 10 some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few months reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these young Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one yeare and lesse (in that World of a perpetuall Spring) become alse trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight, as arte or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees 20 considered with all his young ones, may (indeed) throw foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner part of Trinidado. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue scene hie hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauailed a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith 30 hee) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill is described to bee.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleueeth) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselves from the presence of God, for no other tree (saith he) could contayne them. But first it is certayne, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger then the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plurall number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-ce-pha, word for word) is, That when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse, which Plinie auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum peltis effigiem Amazonia habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield. which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis
PENTHESILAEA furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESIURA leades into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to bee beleued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to this his borrowed discouerie, vying this confident (or rather cholericke) speech: Quis erit tam impudenter obstinatus, si hac a nobis de sicu hac ex antiquis scriptoribus cum Moyses narratione comparet, ut audeat dicere aliam arborem inueniri posse, quam illa magis quadret? Who will be so impudently obstinate, if he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient Writers deliuered, with the narration of Moses, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this Tree, sorting in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beleife, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum pura ac simplicis Obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, then thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience. Ausg. de Civit. Dei, l. 13. c. 10.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BVt in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to bee true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpright towards God, vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and falsning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbrioufnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke and shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remayned in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities, which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this 30 fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into chollier and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures conuerted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparent pride and large vanities; and if we seeke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peaze; glorie, to all the world apparent; goodness, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and 40 boughes of this Tree, by so much exceed all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meanest: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, rather siring and becoming the vnworthyest Shrub, and humblest Bryar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing statelynesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after hee had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, fought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and mortall bodies: to pamper and maintayne which, wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

§. IIII.

Of the name of the tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the storie of Adams sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propertie of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-cephas an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by Masius) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab eueni; The Tree of Knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection then euer any man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose feed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortallitie from the breath or spirit of God, he could not (for these respects) bee ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods Commandement was the fearefullest euill, and the obseruation of his Precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health doe (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sickness is grievous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering and experience in themselves they afterwards witness: so was it with Adam, who could not bee ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the proofe thereof in himselfe another terror then he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie soule, he beheld therein the horror of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in body and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had any such operation, by any selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are given to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, by cause of the euent (as is aforesaid): so was the Well of contention therefore called Eck, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of Stones, called the heape of witness, betwene Isaac and Laban, not that the Stones bare witness, but for a memorie of the Covenants. So Isaac called the house of God Bethel: and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Fuentis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge then he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his issues doe) into the miseries and sorrows incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glorie which he might obtayne by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleading persuasions, vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtile arguments of Satan, who laboured to possion mankind in the very roote, which he moylned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

80. Item. 2. 12.

But what meanes did the Deuill find out, or what instruments did his owne sublerie present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischief by? euen the vnquiet vanitie of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voice of his wife, contrary to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subject of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being given to man for a Comforter and Companion, but not for a Counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voice of thy wife, &c. (saith God himselfe.) Cursed is the earth for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted; euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beasts, into whom the Deuill entred and perswaded.

Gen. 3. 17.

Secondly, what was the mooue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vniting her knowledge, an affection which hath euer since remayned in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her persuasions? euen the same cause vvhich hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwilllingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest shee should pine and be ouer-come with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of David, Gods chosen seruants, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisdomes, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a Woman; it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue beene allured to so many inconuenient and wicked practices, by the perswasions of their wiues, or other be'loved Darlings, who couer ouer and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

p. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of CAIN'S sinne: and of his going out from God.

THe same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possessed Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (envious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slue him, making himselfe the first Murtherer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall Murther, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cried out that his punishment was greater then he could beare. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, vrged and prouoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind, but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God: of which in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The Earth was filled with euill: and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying, An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with euill through them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this euillie meant to haue beene in taking away the liues of men only, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this Murther of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the literal sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non aliteris temporibus, (sed) trump. simul & God (saith Saint AUGUSTINE) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by interchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, David witnesseth: If I be in Heauen (saith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also. But what is meant thereby? Exijt a facie Dei (saith CHRYSTOSTOME) CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfauoured and bereaued of his protection.

Of CAIN'S dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

His word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Senectientie conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wandering in his cogitations, then any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murther committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And whosoever findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and wee call those people Wanderers and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling and abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth in what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after Cain departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a Citie, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enoch; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather fought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrillus saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel vnjustly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Iewes, after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates: and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their owne vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soeuer, which in old time liued by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it Ireland; vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Creteskes, Nomades, and by the Laines, Pastores vagi; as the Northern Tartarians, the Cretians, and Nomadians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish: yea, each were the Inhabitants of Italie it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gave them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, vfed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Protonie, Calena, which also might be deriued of Carana, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts it may be gathered by the first pollution of his Father Adam; for thus it is written, Gen. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken: and in the Verse following: Thou be cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden he set the Cherubims: which sheweth that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text, Cain also in the same Region fought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Ned or Nata doe signify profundus, that is a faineine, we can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, then till he built the Citie of Enoch, the first of the World, which he inclosed either for his owne defence, or (as Ieseph writeth) to oppresse others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolu'd with the Septuagint, that Ned was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vsed of himselfe, it seemeth by the perclose of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as traueleth in feare of reuengement: for whosoever Iudeth me (saith Cain) shall flay mee, or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and faith out from the fauour of God.

And because the Henochians, so called of the Citie Henoch, were the first societie and civil assembly of all other, it is likely that the fame of these people (either for crueltie, strength, or other actions) lued in the memorie of Noah and his Sonnes, so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and every a true minde lefting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in crueltie and oppression tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Henoch lived before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remayne (as the Pillars or the foundation of Topped did) gaue occasion to the Planters of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of these Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pomus, and Colchis in Iberia, Segidia, and Bactria, and of the same name many Mountaines, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath covered over or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therein take our felicitie, if so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & Nations there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

In Plinie, P. Otela, Strabo, Valerius Flaccus, Lucan, Stephanus, we finde those Hemiochi described, though duerly written, as in Plinie, Sometimes Hemiochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus Hemiochi, in Lucan Eniochi, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Exusine, but yet none of these are on the Eastside of Eden, or (according to Mofes words) Eastward from Eden. For Mofes, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South. In the place of Genesis the eleuenth hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly. And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, but in this of Cain he addeth the word 'towards' as, in the Land of Nod, towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations tooke name of Henoeh the Citie of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Henoeh of Colchis, & other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name, after the Sonnes of Noah began to fill the World againe: because, had these Henoeh the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, and not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Plinie findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards hee goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For hee calleth these of Colchis (now Atengrelia) Sami Hemiochis Ptolomei Zanis, beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond theſe he againe diſcouereth a third Nation, from whence all the reſt tooke beginning, which inhabited on the Weſt ſide of the Mountaines of Papouſia, betweene them and the great Riuer of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North ſide; and theſe Henochy are due Eaſt from the Region of Eden, and Eaſtward from the very Garden it ſelfe.

And although we cannot bee assured, that these Henchij. tooke name from the memorie of the Citie of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited due East from Paradise, and afterwards spred themselves Westward (as all Noahs Sonnes did that came into Shinar) the conjecture is farre more probable, then that of Aninus the Frier, who sets Henchij in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these feuerall Nations of the Hemochij, Stephanus findeth a Region called Hemochia; and the same alle in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Sagdiana, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Hemiochi) which signifieth Carts or Coach-men; make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Cassor and Pellux (to wit) Am-phites and Telchins, who attended them in the enterprize of Iafon into Colchis.
though I doe not deny, but that Iafon with other Greekes reared the Coits of Asia the 30 Ieffe in an open Boat or kind of small Galley, * of whom I shall speake in his owne time; yet no man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Flcece was for the most part Poetticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and lesse use of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAINS Generation.

BYr of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the Citie of Henoeh in prophane Storie, thus much may suffice. Now it followeth to answer some few Objections against certain particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (having no other assistance then his Sonne Henoeh) to performe such a Worke as the building of a Citie, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To what it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vlieth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that he containeth the whole Storie of the first Race, which lasted by the least account, 1616. yeares, in fise thort Chapters. Yet thus much may every man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first Generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. and 900. yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and meanes to build many such Cities as Henoeh, be the capacite answering to what other of the World foucer: for in what Age of Cains life he built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whole times, and the times of his Illiues Moses had the least care. And as it was said of Cain, that he built a City: so was it said of Noah, that his three Sonnes peopled all the World, but in both, the proccesse of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vlieth where the space lesseth require it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betweene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, he spake it in this sort, Fuit ante post dies multos et a fine diurnum (that is) in proccesse of time, it came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to bee vnderstood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, he built the Citie of Enoch or Henoeh.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that he built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Hierusalem; yet it well knowne of Salomon, that he employed in that Worke, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our felues to saye, The King invaded; when he caused an invasion to be made: and hee built, when he commanded such a building. And therefore seeing we find that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be marvailed at, why he also passeth ouer in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: Cain also knew his Wife, who conceived and bare Enoch, and he built a Citie, and called the name of the Citie after the name of his sonne Enoch. And to Enoch was borne Irad, and Irad begat Methuiahel, and Methuiahel begat Methusael, and Methusael begat Lamech. Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And Seth lived an hundred and five yeares, and begat Enoch, and Seth died after he begat Enoch 807. yeares, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: thus all the dayes of Seth were 912. yeares, and he died as for the yeares & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro vitium, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in; and finished it with care, passing ouer the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembereth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. ADAM.

2 Cain.	7 Lamech, who by	2 Seth	7 Enoch.
3 Enoch.	Ada had	3 Enosh.	8 Mathusalem.
4 Irad.	8 Tubal and Tubal, &	4 Caiman:	9 Lamech, and
5 Mahuiahel.	by Silla Tubalcain,	5 Mahaleel.	10 Noah.
6 Mathusalem.	and Noëma.	6 Irad.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Iosephus giueth vnto Lamech threecore and seuentene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wiues Ada and Silla: and to these three Sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Inuention of Pastorage, of Musicke, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into Heards and Droues: Tubal inuented Musicke, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to Idleness and Pleasure. In whom beganne these three meaner degrees of Shepheards, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinitie, Prophecie, and Astronomie: the Children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

IV.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

Second scruple hath bene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuentie yeares, Mahaleel and Enoch at threecore and hie yeares, whereas Iared begat not any of his vntill he was 162. yeares old: Mathusalem begat at a 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeares. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot bee coniectured, that either Iared, Mathusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the Religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enoch, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threecore and ten yeares old.

The apparent difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sonnes of the Patriarchs, but he drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger as he found them: for it is likely that Enoch was not the eldest of Irada, nor Lamech the first-borne of Mathusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but so that Noah might haue had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham and Iaphet, though these three were only named, and suruiuing, and which by God were referred to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten yeares who was the first Sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Mathusalem begat Lamech in the 187. yeare of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other Sonnes of Mathusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this

Saint

Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth and one and twentieth Chapters, De Cinitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, & so to Abraham, and the children of the Promise after him, so doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogie of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who haue hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitorie only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael was first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esaue the elder; neither is Christ deriued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simon, or Leui, but from Juda a fourth Brother, and so from Daniell a younger sonne of Iessai; and lastly, we find, that the Kingdome it selfe of Juda was not giuen to the Heire in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Salomon.

V.

Of the long lines of the Patriarchs: and some of late memorie.

The third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeares betwene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well-neere seene a thousand yeares, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after-Ages, seeing, that soone after the Flood, men liued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that haue heron resolved that those yeares were but Lunarie yeares, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeares, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enosh in the yeare of his life an hundred and hie, if those yeares bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeares, and one Moneth when hee begat Enosh: & if the time of Enosh haue the same allowance, when hee begat Kenan, then could Enosh at that time haue bene but like yeares and fortie eight weekes old; and so it may bee gathered of the rest excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and feed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an abilitie of Generation at six, seuen or eight yeares, agreeth with the short lines of the Pigmies, and not with the continuations of our first fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the Word, had length of dayes and abilitie of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunarie yeares, then there would follow this extremitie, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeares, had by that account but the time of fourescore and ten and odd yeares; which were not only lesse by farre then the Patriarchs liued after the Flood, but short of many mens liues in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourescore, & some a hundred yeares. Further (if need be) to disproue this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 23. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeares: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeares) makes but seuentene and an halfe of our yeares.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it unreasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget Children of equal strength or little differing: for of the first and purest seed there must of necessity spring vp the fairest and fruitfulllest Plants. Secondly, the Earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmefull qualitie, as since that time the Curse of God for the crueltye of mans heart brought on it and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Flood infused such an impuritie, as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbs, and Fruits vpon the Earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another of weaknesse, a youth & beautie, and then age and deformitie: so Time it selfe (vnder the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath waited and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heauens themselues being of a most pure and clenfed matter, shall waxe old as a Garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the olde age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicitie of liuing differ from that old time? the tender bringing vp of Children, first fedde and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an vnnaturall curiositie hauing taught all Women (but the Begger) to find out Nurles, which necessitie only ought to commend vnto them: The halie Marriages in tender yeares, wherein, Nature being but yet greene and growing, we rent from her and replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe Seeds (for the most part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, and wax old euen in their Infancie. But aboue all things the exceeding luxuriousefne of this gluttonous Age, wherein wee presse Nature with ouer-weightie burdens, and finding her strength decrease, wee take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verses:

Phar. 4.

*O prodigiarum
Luxuries, nunquam paruo contenta parau:
Et questorum terra pelagoq; ciborum
Ambitiosa fames, & laeta gloria mensa, Discite quam paruo liceat producere vitam:
Et quantum Natura petat.
Non auro myrrhâq; bibunt: sed gurgite puro Vita redit: satis est populus fluuijsq; Cerejs.*

O wastfull Riot, neuer well content
With low-priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of Cates by Land and Sea farre fetcht and sent:
Vaine glorie of a Table sumptuous,
Learne with how little life may be preferred,
In Gold and Myrr the they need not to carouse,
But with the Brooke the peoples thirst is seru'd:
Who fed with Bread and Water are not steru'd.

The Aegyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect bodie waxeth and groweth to strength fiftie yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophie, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twentie yeares, and Bersius to a hundred and seuentee yeares. These opinions Plinie repeateth and reprooueth, producing many Examples to the contrarie. In the last taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italie, there were found in the Roll (saith Plinie) foure and fiftie persons of an hundred yeares of age: euen & fiftie of an hundred and ten: two, of an hundred and fife and twentie: foure, of an hundred and thirtie: as many that were hundred and fife & thirtie, or hundred and seuen and thirtie yeares old: & last of all three men of an hundred and foure: and this search was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Sonne.

Pier. l. 7. c. 8.

The simple dyet and temperate life of the Esseians gaue them long account of many yeares: so did it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians, and Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor liued three Ages, and Tiresias six, Sybilla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia little lesse: Also Masaniassa of Numidia liued very long, and Dando of Illyria. Among the Kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (saith Ephorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Epeians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeares: and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians; and that these reports are not fabulous; Iosephus bringeth many witness with him selfe, as Mareathon, Bersus, Mochus, Elius, Hieronymus Aegyptius, Hecateus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the year 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solyman, Generall of the Turkes Armie, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my selfe knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin Müller, who liued in the year 1589. and many yeares since, who was married in Edward the Fourth time, and held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Munster can witness. Strozzius Cicogna, out of Torquemada Massans, and the like Authors, telleth of some that haue not only far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but beene repayed from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh youth. But for length of life, it wee note but the difference betweene the abilitie of men in those dayes wherein Galen the Philician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six Ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and and thin Ayre, and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauy load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

Fourth scruple hath bene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Storie thereof written, and if any such had bene, yet it is conceiued, that all memorie of Antiquitie perished in the vniuersall Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policie of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoever was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publique dispute, but deliuered ouer by heart and tradition from wise men to a posteritie equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine literis, medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdraus, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Mirandula conceiue) that Moses did not onely upon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but with all, seruatiem & verum legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) he deliueied by mouth to Iosuah, and Iosuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quam dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, then to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as seru'd in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Jews was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

Dion. Arop.

Fol. 8.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids and Bards of our ancient Brittaines, and of later times by the Irish Chronicles called Rymers. If then such as would seeme wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the storie of the Creation or beginning of all things was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliueied vnto him by a more certaine presumption, then any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had perseru'd and left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniurie of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of; it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred fortie and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse then fife hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fiftie and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinarie way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the verie infancie of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch, of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remain'd euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queene of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth that he had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and storie of

of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did: which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Origen, Augustine, Bedæ, Procopius, Gaseus, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions; allegeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was deluged by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Pererius, that such a Booke there was, and that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, and many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquitie thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Deuill about the bodie of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inuentions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neyther Philo, nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquitie) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nomina divina Enoch illam septimum ab Adam negare non possunt: That ENOCH the seventh from ADAM did write diuine things we cannot denie. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquitie, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be begotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Booke was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Iudaico (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preferred by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Jude, the Jewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans conjecture. And (certainly) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heauens, and of the Natures and coniunctions of the Staeres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is verie probable that Noah had science and might preferre this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly inuented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath beene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah liued with Methuselah, who liued with Adam, and Abraham liued with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceiue how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala and tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other prooffe then self-authority.

¶ VII.

Of the men of renoune before the Flood.

NOW let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth Seuen descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten: Seth being giuen by God in stead of Abel; and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publike. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they serued and praised God by Communion and in publike manner, or calling vpon the name of the Lord, and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Enoch the sonne of Jared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the births of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Enoch it is written, That he walked with God, and he was no more seene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that he was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah: Noah was a iust and vpright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seuentie convert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Alexander and others vnderstand this place, (iustum enim Deus scilicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) he died, which (indeed) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he died; yet the difference which Moses maketh betwene the pietie of Enoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs,

triarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to all else, makes it manifest, that Enoch was not dissolved as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these words, And he died; but of Enoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, he was missing, or he was not seene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deum circumtransiit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Enoch were not with the same kind of changing, which Satan promiseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, we shall not all dye, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Diuines.

After Enoch, Moses passeth ouer to Methuselah and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This same shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writeth more amply, then of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, beeing the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Familie) preferred, because hee was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, pence, gouernement, and policie of these strong and mightie men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memorie remayning: whose stories if they had bin preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue bene left to posteritie. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessitie must the same adde of wisdom and vnderstandings? Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when wee no sooner begin to know, but wee begin to die; according to HYPOCRATES: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus preceps; (which is) Life is short, Art is long, and Time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses; These were mightie men, which in old time were men of renoune. But these men of renoune (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and crueltie of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the pietie of Seth, and the wises wherein Enoch walked: For all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, only euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersall, when the children and sonnes of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and mis-led by their idolatrous wises, the Daughters of Cain, or of those other men, losing themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beautie of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lullavimus and Eusebius, mis-led by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great advantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers and very needlesse: the question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; and on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) behold the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his Commandements, should after a separation from the rest which fell with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrarie both to Nature and Grace, were more then madnesse to imagine.

¶ VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

IF these Giants which Moses calleth mightie men, Coropius became an Antropian (who thought his owne wit more Gigantically then the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayed his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reason (whosoever desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrollus reproues the Grecians Poets for their monstrous fictions: who affirme shamefully,

That

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely cast vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hills, and making warre with the Gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the storie of Nimrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiodus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the Daughters of men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subiect) thus changed into Latine:

*Nomine celestis illos dixere Gigantes,
Orti quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine cali.*

From the Earth, and from thy blood, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the Gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opinators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceiue that there were in the first Age such kind of men; and of which there haue beene in all times since? Seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue straying of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants, and therefore had abilitie to oppress; then say, That they were called Giants onely, because Oppressors. For first, Moses himselfe calleth them mightie men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vnder-taking and aduenterous action. And if the same stature of body, and abilitie had not beene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly harkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompanie the Giants of Albion, in the storie of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerely and without all allegorical construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephaims in Asteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummims in Ham, and the Enims, which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims, which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for Giants as the Anakims: Likewise, where Moses speaketh of the Land of Ammon, he vseth these words: That also was taken for a land of Giants, for Giants dwelt therein afore-times: & whom the Ammonites call Zanzummims: a people that was great, and many, and tall as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephaims in Asteroth and Karnaim, and the Zuzai or Zanzummims, Chedorlaomer King of Elam ouer-threw, assisted by other Kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of Giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, and whose strength to the Oke; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og, King of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for onely Og King of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdome of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlaomer. Moreover, those Discouersors and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadesbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in general, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sonnes of Anak, which come of the Giants, so that we seemed in our sights like Grasshoppers, and so wee were in their sights, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a marvellous difference betweene the Anakims and themselves: inso much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into Agypt, and were more willing to endure their former slauiery, then to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations. Furthermore, the Scriptures put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of sixe cubits and a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed fixe thousand shickles of brasse: the shaft of his speare was like a Weauers beame, and his speare-head weighed fixe hundred shickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliath, surnamed Geibens, because he was of Geib: and of three other Giants, of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure & twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as it had bene a Kid, and after slue thirtie of the Philistines, and (after that) a thousand more of them with a law-bone of an Asse: And lastly, hee tooke the gates of Azazab, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approved by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infiebled and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her young ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mightie men, and men of renowne as farr exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembred by Moses of his owne time, and after him their successors, as the ordinarie proportion of all men in general, scarce after the flood and in times farr off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and new-nesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in crueltie and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to theiult Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man, which S. Augustine thus expoundeth: Neq. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui paniter, quum esset de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa presentia. Sed si non videtur Scriptura talibus verbis, non se quodammodo familiaris infirmavit omni generi hominum, quibus vult esse consultum: et perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quærentes, & aliat intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men vs to doe) but if the Scripture did not vse those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would provide: that it might terrifie the proud, stir up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that vnderstand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

Ere before we proceed any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Storie of the Creation, and by deluicing it ouer in a mysticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumperie, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might recue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets and Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skilfull and learned Chymist can aswell by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poysen, as poysen out of the most healthfull herbes and plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrarie to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth finde out euery where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Storie of the first Age, with all the works and mannales thereof, amply and liuely express.

§. II.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselves were verie ancient : as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Egyptians.

BVt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one hauing erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberal grace of God being with-drawne) all the posteritie of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetuall Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmefull qualitie, as the waters of the general flood could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former poyson. For as the children of Sam did inherit the vertues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was onely due to the Creatour. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phoenicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue feuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped; and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Duodecim Deorum nomina primos Aegyptios in usu habuisse, atque Gracos ab illis cepisse mutatos, eosq. prius aras, & imagines, & templa Djs sibi creasse; The Egyptians (saith he) first deuised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greekes receiued from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

Herod. in Eustrop.

§. III.

That in proceesse of time these lesser errors grew on greater : as appeareth in the grosse Superstitions of the Egyptians.

BVt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander foreuer more in vices vnknowne, and daily trauaile towards their eternall perdition : so did these grosse and blind Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and thinke and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true and very God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemie, Rhodius Anaxandrides derideth in this manner :

Nat. com. l. c. 7.

Bonem colis, ego Deis mallo bouem.

Tu maximum Anguillam Deum putas : ego Obsoniorum credidi suuissimum.

Carnes suillas tu caues, at gaudeo

Ihs maximè : canem colis, quem verbero Edentem vbi deprehendo fortè obsonium.

I sacrifice to God the Beefe, which you adore.

I broyle the Egyptian Eccles, which you (as god) implore:

You feare to eate the flesh of Swine, I finde it sweet.

You worship Dogges, to beate them I thinke meet,

When they my store deuoure.

And in this manner I VERNAL.

*Porrum aut cape nefas violare aut frangere morsu :
O sanctas gentes, quibus hac nascuntur in hortis Numina!*

The Egyptians thinke it sinne to root vp, or to bite
Their Leekes or Onyons, which they serue with holy rite :
O happy Nations, which of their owne sowing Hauc store of gods in euerie Garden growing!

§. IIII.

§. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols & Fables were inuented : and that the first Iupiter was CAIN, VULCAN, TYBALCAIN, &c.

BVt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certayne, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remayning after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the sonne of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah. For all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, and date of times, cannot be fayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, and Mercuries with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Anobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit, the Phoenicians, Phrygiens, Cretians, Greek, and other Nations; yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne : for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochy before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Iugium in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For, besides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latissimam a primo & antiquissimo Ioue adificatam : yet the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Iupiter, seated in the East parts, or in Iudaa, according to that of Moses : And Cain dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochy were found after the Flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Polieus, a Founder of Cities, and Hercius, an incloser or strengthener of Cities; (say Phormion and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Hercius there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that there were Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increace, they built many Cities; which as his meaning he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Lawes : for he saith, that Cities were built annexedding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnicks was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister (as also Iupiter is said to haue done) inhabited the East, where Stephanus de viribus placeth the Citie Henochia. And besides this Citie of Henoch, Philo Iudeus conceiueth that Cain built fixe others, as Mach, Jared, Tebe, Iefca, Seler and Gebat; but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnicks had the inuention of Sacrifice : so were Tubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inuents of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Mulock) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, and Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name betwene Tubalcain and Vulcan; so doth Augustine expound the name of Naema or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Fousset, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter, Ena, Rhea, and Naema or Naamath the first Venus : so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne arise, from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah : so also was the Fiction of those Golden Aples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent; which tempted Enab : so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides : the prophecies, that Christ should breake the Serpents head, and conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and capteining Cerberus : so out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuerfion of their Heroes (the inuents of Religion, and such Artes as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and ascension of Adraa; of which Ouid:

For although thereby the Ethnicks would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue fayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person; yet as it is vsuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus, so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices, and therefore by Iustice and Astraea, Enoch: the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses, for Noah was said to be a iust man; and Noah walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

Gen. 5. 22. 24.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembred the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vnderaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Senerius thus describeth:

L. de ciuit. Dei.

Tentauere (nesio) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captiuūq; Iovis transerre Gigantes Imperium, & victo leges imponere calo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heauens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moysture of a second Flood, but that by this building (if they had beene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heauen it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and couenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, wherof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. Who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

Ioseph. l. 1. contra Aegyptios.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Enoch and Noah: for Amenophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successour Sethe, of Seth; and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, wherof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Setheicia. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Setbia, and others of the same name elswhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Gracians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne; and that they might not seeme to learne elswhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefe IVPITERS; and the strange storie of the third.

BUt of all those armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh 50 but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who sought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for Aether is as much as shining or pure fire); the other discovered his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witness of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Caelum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third of whom all the Gracian fables were deuised, was of Crete (now Candia), the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iunans Pater, from the Greeke word Zeus, it signifieth life, but somewhat strayed. Boccat in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiueth, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull, (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings, beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but how4 sooner they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoeuer deferred) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deservings. Ioues omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui, The Ancients called all Kings IVPITERS, as Tzetzes in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Ioues vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings IVPITERS. But where this last and most remembered Iupiter was borne, it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that he was but sent thither by his mother Ops or Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the furie of Titan his vncl: because it was conditioned betwene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by Titans permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is sayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine;

Hand sit pinguior, | Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne,
Crudis sepulchrum quod sit ipse filij. | By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betwene Titan and Saturne, Syllilla also witnesseth in these;

Conceptis verbis; TITAN inuare coegit SATVRNVM, de se natum ne nutriat vllum, Quo possint regnare semis post sua Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne swear
No sonne to nourish; which by reigning might Vsurpe the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Tuno, conuoyed Iupiter (first called Iysanias) into Crete, as thee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Island, by Cressa the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof.

Euseb. in Temp.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes, and a Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that hee was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof hee changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow; a reward well fitting such a god: others, that he was nourished by Beares: others, by Goats: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him and his wife prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull fled into Italie, and left his Kingdome in Crete to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee was once seeled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Tuno, but hee rauished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdome, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written were of greatest fame, Niohe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon, by whom hee had Pelagius, Sarpdon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete he had Taygetus; of whom the Mountayne Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Sauna:
G 2 by

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Lada, Castor and Pollux, Helen and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus: by Iordana, Deucalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protegeia, he had Athlus the father of Endymion: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphi in Aegypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Country tooke name, for so the Greeks afterward called Africa. Hee rauilhed Aegina the daughter of Aefopus, and carryed her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Agina, on whom he begat Aacus: by Torrhebia hee had Archefilaus and Carbus: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanius by Electra, who built Dardanium, afterward Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talieson, on Thalia, and on Garamanti, Hiarhas. He had besides these (if they belye not their chiefe 10 God) Phileus and Pilumnus, inueters of Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his feuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wiues, daughters, and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into thowres of gold, eagles, buls, birds, and beasts; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries. And yet did not the Greeks and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deserued nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith LVCIANVS). Cretenses non solum natum apud se 20 sepultum loven testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely auow that IVPITER was borne and buried among them, but they shew his grave and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountayne Iafus. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witnesseth, but as offended thereat, saith thus:

Lat. in Sacrif.

The Cretians euer lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu't alway.

Diod. L. 4. c. 5.

Diodorus Siculus tels by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greeke Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africk. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Pranus (which signififieth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wiues 45. sons; but by his principall wife Titea, he had seuentene sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Bastila (which name sounding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after her fathers death, being 40 as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sonne and Mooone. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children moued her brethren to enuy, and bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signifified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortal, that also the Sonne and Mooone should bee called by their names, 50 and that their death should bee reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and withall held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, vvhich name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren vvhilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Pranus diuided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaynes, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere, said to haue supported Heauen. He

He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hefferus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue bene carried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his contemplations, and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue bene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be deified, or registred among the Worthies, brought forth children, answerable in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Sicilia, part of Africk and Italie. Jupiter, another of the sonnes of Pranus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes which 10 he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wiues name, Idea; in which Ile hee dyed, and was buried. But this Jupiter must not haue bene that great one, but vnto the great Jupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerua, neare to the Riuer Triton, whom thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused fiercely, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerua, and certayne Nymphs. To Amalthea he gaue in reward a goodly 20 Country, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthea: plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, shee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entercayned her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, *Jupiter*s children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Creta the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may seeme, being very gracious in those times) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper yong man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, 30 before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titanes; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not furre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerua, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerua the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titanes prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himselfe so well, that he vvan the loue of all the people by vvhom he passed; insomuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturnes rigorous government, he was greatly strengthened, and the enimie as much 40 infiebled by daily reuolts. Comming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a yong sonne by Rhea, called Jupiter. This child, Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countries; and comming into Egypt, he left this Jupiter, being then a boy, Governor of the Country; but appointed vnto him as an Ouer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Jupiter grew to be called Olympius. Whilste Bacchus traualled through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and 50 began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Jupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerua, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods, ioyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke, and slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Jupiter, the sonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titanes left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betwene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the Expeditions of Osiris, and of

Phacchus; the warres of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdome of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus, by Baschus to Iupiter, the rattles of Ihis, and the cymbals of Basilea, with many petty circumstances, needly enough resemble each other, howsoever not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Eusebius cites him) would have all these to be Phœnicians, and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet hee makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Phanus or Heauen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diodorus, though Diodorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he addes Elius or the Sunne, as father of Phanus, and among the children of Phanus, Iapetus, Rutilus, and Dagon (whom Diodorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Phanus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigena, and of Illus to Saturne, but omitting Iupiter of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this:

of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof some gat, some affected the name of Gods.

EF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saturnus Babilonicus, otherwise Nimrod, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (at least by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him remembered: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no farther off for their Gods.

But the Egyptians, euen after the flood, began (some what before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Mizraim, Iupiter Chamman, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab arenis, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peucez) neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot and scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes and Romans the most renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his sonnes is made manifest; namely, Castor, Pollux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which lived in that age of Priamus, vnder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortal among the Heathen; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander Macedon, Tiberius, Nero, Caligula, and others, sought to be numbered among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Flora, which was giuen to Venus? seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as she was.

¶ V I I.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

ET that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleeued in any of these fooleries, it cannot bee suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inuentions with the Scriptures: for, in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung and pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the books of Moses, as by places stolne thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembereth many in that Treatise conuerted by Mirandula. As for Plato, though hee dissembled in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembered) Et mirifice is delectatus est, que de vno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howsoever Lactantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the lawes, and books of Moses: Eusebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, finde reason to beleuee the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee tooke the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie: and the same opinion had Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possesse all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; or fearing the seueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates, by them put to death by poyson, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to *Plato*s feare, whose words among many other of the same effect, are these; Plato Mosens mentionem facere, ob id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses inueni non putauit, veritus Areopagum; Plato fearing the seueritie of Moses, that hee taught that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in Timæo; id ipsum de Deo deseruit quod & Moses; Hee dissembled and taught the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr) which Moses did. For whereof pleased God by his Angell to answer Moses, Ego sum existens (which is) I am; and, existens, misit me ad vos; I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ then that Cristos vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses enim qui existit inquit, quod quod existit; For Moses saith, He who is, PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceiue, or expresse the same, hee giueth this testimonie: Genitorem vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile digne profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him wor: hily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maiestic of Gods Nature, then this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and (so assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is euill he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factiouis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The loue of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APVLEIUS the Platonist: Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam nature dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfectio bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not only by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God then a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. Athenodorus, that therefore all men ought to be careful in the actions of their life, because God was euerywhere present and beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Aristotles storie of the Creation, then this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of Anaxagoras?

*Calum terraq; vnus forme fuit:
Sed cum fuissent abintu amplexu mutus,
Emergit omnis in lucem res progenita,
Arbores, aues, ferae, quasq; affert mare, Grassq; mortalium.*

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when disioyned once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then,
Of trees, birds, beastes, fishes, and men
The still-remaining races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euery-where expresse the infinite and sole power of one God, though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time; but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which hee doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDVLA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium damonum, a quibus malum & non bonum preuenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom ORPHEVS doth sing, are not of deceiuing Devils, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speaketh of God himselfe, this his instruction to Museus, and the Hymne following teach vs: Respicens vero ad diuinum hunc sermonem ea diligenter animam aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascendende viam, & solum apicem mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse vero in diuina versatur, nec quisquam eum inueneri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reason's sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still, nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

And againe the same Author,

*Iupiter omnipotens, & primus, & vltimus idem;
Iupiter est caput & medium: Iouis omniunus.
Iupiter est fundamen humi & stellantis Olympi.
Iupiter & mas est, & famina nescia mortis.
Spiritus est cunctis, validi vis Iupiter ignis.
Et pelagi radix, SOL, LVNA, est Iupiter ipse
Rex & origo simul rerum est, & terminus idem.
Nam prius occultuit, magno post numine, sacrum
Cor referans bonis in dulcem dedit omnia lucem.*

The

The first of all is God, and the same last is he.
God is the head and midit, yea from him all things be.
God is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, I shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is God, the SVNNE and MOONE, and what is higher.
The King, th'originall of all, of all the end,
For close in holy breitt he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Aegyptians, Gracians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will only repeat two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Lactantius, Eusebius, Eugubinus, Pencer, Plesius, Danew, and others. For Cleambes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, scipsum possidens, vtilis, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, charitas, &c. Good, iust, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, seuer, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious and selfe-charitie. EPICHRAMVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euery nature, was only and euery where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipse solus; Hee is the only King of Kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, arj, optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersis secundum merita prabet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euery thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elswhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Saue onely in that euertlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hercof also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIUS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like vnto mortals: and DEMOCRITON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq; quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifest to none, saue onely to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light.

Finally, Plato saith: Totius rerum natura causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi generator, aternus animantium sospitator, assiduus mundi sui opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neg, loco, neg, tempore villo comprehensus, eoq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini effabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soules, the euertall preseruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceiue him in thought, none can expresse what hee is. Therefore was it said by S. Hierome, S. Hieron. in Cam. in Dan. la princip.

enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est vs in eis reperias aliquam partem vasorum Dei, vs apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM Stoicorum Principem, inferos & immortales animas &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: In ZENO Prince of the Stoicks, Hell and immortal soules, &c. And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisdom of all Ages, wee shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the Arte of education hath not bended; whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are soper, and by a pensile inspecti- on aduised; but that he hath found by an vnresistable necessitie, one true God, and euertlasting being, all for euery causing, and all for euery sustaining; who no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, then that Aegyptian Hermes, howsoeuer it fayled outward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuilish policie of the Aegyptian Priests purposely obscured; who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under IULIAN miraculously confounded.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall then themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, quencheth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with *Iuno*s ielousies; Death hath perswaded him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, their stately Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houles and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the Earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phenicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Cyreta, Thessalia, or elsẽwhere, that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollos Priests are become speechlesse; and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfeit Agyptians, and cozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gaue way to these his ouer-throwes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delpbos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repayed, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and vtter subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubœan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians utterly sackt; Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phœceses: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence fise hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But whatsoever was gathered betweene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remayned till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the successe of his Parthian enterprise, at which time it was vterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein molten downe and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Jewes in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Hierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Jewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Jewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Province of Iudea, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, made the enterprise frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOW the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer, findes it more for his aduantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuall adoration of himselfe then euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idoll of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddesse of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of Nature; and lastly, that as all vertue (in generally) is without taste: so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, then in the obtaining of power to oppress, and of riches to maintayne plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-politician find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that he

he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeuours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged pauerie, and despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-grown with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperitie by the other: at the entrance of the one wee find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, couetousnesse, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer: the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an euening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

OF NOAH'S Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAH'S Flood.

F this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem Ioseph. l. i. c. 41 migravit: He departed with his children, and traualled into another Region. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Berosus writeth in this manner: That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and vnnatural wickednesse, and that they were contemptores & religious & Deorum, contempters of religion and of the Gods: among which mightie men (saith Berosus) vnus erat qui Deorum venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huic nomen erat NOAH, There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods then the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sonnes Sem, Iaphetus, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Tisca the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noegla) preferred themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God sayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Fine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were alreadye fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp and couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Ayre: Noah and his family excepted.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not bene received by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perwade all naturall men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum obvolata in obscuro veritas latet: Whilst the truth lieth wraps vp in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitye of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued so to thinke, because in elder ages there haue bene many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholus Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus: Est super Mimya- 120p. cent. l. i. c. 47 dam excelsus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confugientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos, & quendam simul in Arca deuictum in huius vertice habisse, lignorumq; reliquias multo tempore conseruatas, qui fortasse is fuit, de quo etiam Moses Iudeorum Legislator scribit: thus saith the Author. There is (saith he) about Mimya (or the Country of Mimya) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remayned a long time after certayne pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which Moses the Law-giuer of the Jewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the Thal-

T habundists (saith Annins) that many Giants faued themselves vpon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, how soeuer he haue bene since deformed and corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: An-te apnarium eladem famolam, qua vniuersis peris Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of Waters, by which the World vniuersall perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Titea, and his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only faued.

¶ II.

of the Flood in the time of OGYGES: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood.

BUt from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perswade the world, that there was no Flood preceded the Flood of Ogyges, King of the Thebans in liuotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus) OGYGES id appellat Poeta, tanquam peruenit dixeris, ab OGYGE venutissimo: The Poets gave the name of OGYGIA to things exceeding ancient, as of OGYGES the most ancient.

But let Ogyges be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Iacobus time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Ogyges was Cadmus (and then was he farre later) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembreth: Sunt tamen qui in Aegypto regnasse autumant hunc: unde sit CADMVS qui in Greciam profectus Thebas condidit, à boue ingulato si nuncupatus; quoniam Syrorum lingua bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this OGYGES did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who traualing into Greece built Thebes so named of a beeste slaine: because in the Syrian Language, a beeste is called Thebe.

But this Flood of Ogyges fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betwene these Floods, wanting but 30 two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet who soeuer makes it most ancient, finds about 300. yeeres difference betwene that and the generall Flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040 yeeres before Rome built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder then Rome; which was founded (according to the same Bucholzerus) in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Ogyges (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Ogyges in his true age) the difference betwene these two Floods must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Ogyges was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Ogyges Priscus, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Ogyges then King of Attica or Ogygia, did not extend it selfe any further then the banks of Archi-pelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witness, that the Citie of Ioppen in Iudea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remayned on certayne Altars of Stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: shew, it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Flood of Ogyges spred it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Cities seated on the North part of Peloponnesus) of which Ouid:

*Si queras Helicon, & Bura, Achaidos vrbes.
Inuenies sub aquis.*

lib. 15. 303.*

*Si queras Helicon, & Bura, Achaidos vrbes,
Inuenies sub aquis.*

Bura and Helice, on Achaia ground
Are fought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Ogyges was inuented the Fable of Apollo and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Cæus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Iuno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliuered on; and withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, where soeuer she trauelled: till at length arriuing at the Ile of Orygia, she was there receiued; in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apollo, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Ogyges his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and fogges, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neyther the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre, or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Orygia espied the light of the Moone somewhat before day, and in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apollo the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Orygia, thereof afterwards called Delos; which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Ogyges being so great, as Historics haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Castor, that so great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was scene before, nor in after-times: For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Astrallus Cylicenus, and Dion Neapolites, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Ogyges.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of so good Astrologers flourishing among the Greekes, or elsewhere in those dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets so exact, that it should need no reformation. Of the colour and magnitude. I see no reason, why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous, considering, that lesser mists and fogges than those which couered Greece with so long darknesse, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightned by him, the opposite half should remaine shadowed; whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, decryning onely that part whereon the light filleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perspective Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much to haue bene discovered in Venus, by his late obseruations. Whether some watric disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that liued with Ogyges, as Galileus hath scene through his Instrument; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather conuince Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Ogyges, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effects in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was general, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or fore-shewing, then the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and took them all away.

Of DEVCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia; of which, S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (or VARRO scribit) regnante Atheniensibus CRANAUS, successore CECROPS (ut autem scribit, EUSEBIUS & HIERONYMVS) adhuc eodem CECROPE permanente, dislunium fuit, quod appellatum est DEVCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as VARRO reporteth) CRANAUS the successor of CECROPS gouerning the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and IO HIEROME say) CECROPS yet living, that Flood (called DEVCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleventh Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he vseth these words: Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Aegypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore CECROPS Atheniensium Regu, cum apud Assyrios regnaret ASCATADES, apud Sicyonios MARATHVS, apud Argiuos TRIOPAS: MOSES led the people of God out of Aegypt about the latter times of CECROPS King of the Athenians, ASCATADES reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians MARATHVS, and over the Argiuos TRIOPAS. So as leauing the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was eyther at the e-gression of the children of Israel out of Aegypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753.
yeeres, according to Fundius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409. 20 or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codo-man; then giuing vnto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approued Historians is said to haue bene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dates the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaeton time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argiuos; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiuos fixe yeeres after Israel departed Aegypt, which makes twentie yeeres difference, according to Fundius, who will haue this Flood and Burning to haue fallen 14. yeeres before Moses left Aegypt: for the gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and Burning the yeere 2440. 30 and to Moses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinks that Moses was more ancient, and liued with Inachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaeton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denied by all. Cedrenus of a mistake (called Deucalions) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeeres, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. and so doth P. Orasius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clement Alexandrinus his words: Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidem PHORONEI, qui fuit post INACHVM, inundatio qua fuit tempore OGYGIS: There happened in Greece in the time of PHORONEVS, who liued after INACHVS, the Flood of OGYGES. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orasius; (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it falls out, that Ogyges Flood happened before the Hebrewes left Aegypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference betwene the opinions of Eusebius and Orasius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, then the rest) I reckon the times which came betwene these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1656. Iacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Iacobs birth, there were consumed 511. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Iacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the 30 World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalie was ouerwhel-med; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782.
yeeres. And hereto Annus his Xenophon agreeth, who makes 700. yeeres betwene the generall Flood and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thessalie followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum DEVCALIONIS, secundo anno SPHAEI, springenti supputantur anni, qui natus anno duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of DEVCALION, in the second yeere

yeere of SPHAEI, are numbered 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnassus: witnesseth Aristotile in the first of his Meteoers. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine located first for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of Cranaus, who succeeded Cecrops: Orasius thinks it somewhat later, Amphitryon reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops. Onely this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not onely over Thessalie it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it covered the greatest part of Italie: and eyther the same; or some other particular Flood: then happening, oppressed Aegypt, sayth Eusebius:
10 And therefore did the Greekes eyther thinke it, or faune it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalie (of all other the highest, sayth Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) sayd to be the preferrer of Mankind. That this Flood covered a great part of Italie, Plinius and Solinus make it probable; who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Sabini: quia ab imbris diluvij superfluent, and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trecentius in his second: which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Bruthi, and all others inhabiting anticantly the banks of the Mediterranean Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters 20 of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sinning themselves vpon the Apennine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; shewing who and who onely then were preferred: which is sufficient. Report hath aduincured further, telling vs, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italie, were the Camaseni; (so named from Camela, whom CATO in origimbis, another of Annus his Authors, names for a consort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a savage life; till such time as Saturne arriued on those Coasts, deuiled Lawes to gouerne them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diodor and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Casius and Varro among the Latines haue preferred; and of whom Virgil:

30 *Primus ab aethere venit SATVRNVS, Olympo, Arma Iovis fugiens, & regni exul adeptus,
Is genis indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Maluit.*

SATVRNE descending from the Heavens high,
Fearing the Armes of Iupiter his Sonne,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth flie.
Rude people on the Mountaine tops he wonne
To liue together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

40 And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe sought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tum manus Ausonia, & gentes venere Sicani, Then came th' Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue testimonie: who were againe expelled by the Ligi, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations and replantations came the Vmbri, descended of the Canles (saith Annus) not of those Canles of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, even all 50 Heutria and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius haue assured vs: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion was long after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossed of Italie againe, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being.
So that Kingdome was first called Camasene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) possed the time, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy: Lycan then gouerning Arcadia; who being the father of two and twentie sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held untill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these,

Herod. l. 1.
Plin. l. 3. c. 4.

came the Pelagi, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Tucydides in his sixth, speaks at large: and after them the Lydi, vnder Tyrrenus their Captaine, that gave name to the Tyrreni; who casting thence the Vmbri, took from them three hundred Cattles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had posselt and past over the Apennine Mountaines) they added diuers others, whercof Telphina (afterward Bononia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation, as these Vmbri, in those parts, I doe not affirme; hauing respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinkes, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were defended of the Nation of Scythians (called Galli) it shall be shewed hereafter. 10

§. IIII.

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

Saint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuersall Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodoginus, before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in Englishe commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But 20 as all the parts of the Earth were successively planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not receiued, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigena, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Berosus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (as is aforesaid) though he also affirme by heere-say, that some Giants saued themselves vpon the Mountaines Baris in Armenia, but speake not thereof as from any authentic 30 approved: vntill the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembereth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preferre himselfe from a Flood fore-told him by Saturnus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio confregit; but: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe; which hee also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudd and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Flood.

Euseb. prep.
Euang. l. 4. c. 4.

Cyrillus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timaeo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembereth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient then that of Ogyges in Attica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges, sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belo- 40
chus King of the Assyrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this Flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hereof came the fable of the Pulture on Prometheus his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these words: Flu- 50 fable) denis'd, that Hercules slew the Eagle which sed on Prometheus Liuer; meaning that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow and torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt; where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiue out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fere: prima nouisimisque inundatio terrarum sub 10 prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Inundations (saith this same Xeno- phon:) the first, which was vniuersall, of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogy- ges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three Moneths, in Thessalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the Samothracas for his Authors, remembereth a Flood in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction then any of the other particular Inundations, saying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellepont breaking in ouer the Land.

But there haue been many Floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembered, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregorie then being Bilhop of Rome, there happened a marvellous ouerflowing in Italie, and especially in the Venetian Territories; and in 10
Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull storme of thunder and lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp and left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Tris- themius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that, of a Flood in Frisland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strabo in his 11.
Magia omnifaria, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicily were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander 30 the sixth: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembereth a perillous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Cracovia, by which many people perished. Likewise Viginius a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Langue- doc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Iudgement Day; saying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were removed diuers old heapes and mountours of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, diuers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths inuaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene fore-seene by the Starres.

NOW howsoever all these Floods, and many other, which haue couered at severall times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southayers among them) may be ascrib'd to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall Flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the especial 30 commandement of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Starres and abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe: whereby the irruption of Waters was made more forcible, then any abilitie of Nature could effect, or any second causes by whatsoever vnion could performe, without receiuing from the Fountaine of all power strength and faculties supernaturall. Hieronicus Mechliniensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Iupiter and Saturne, that before the Flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watric Signe, and the House 40 of the Ataone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moysure, according to the rules of Aspionomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Flood by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not beignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not only signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by * Catastrophe Calis (Englithed the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and water coniunction; the word (Catastrophe) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordeane by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake 10 those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Catastrophe Calis, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these watric Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Planets, Mars, Venus, and the Ataone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum intellige Prophetam Hebraeorum Catastrophe Calis vocasse, nisi partes illas Calis, quæ generatiue sunt pluviarum et inundationum aquarum, quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meaneth by these words (Catastrophe Calis, or Windores of Heauen) vntill he thereby vnderstand those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendered the Raine, and 20 Inundations of Waters, such as are the watric Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnfearchable Wisdome this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation encrease of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs and Fountaynes, commanding them to call out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoever else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

§. V I.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Flood: And what are Catastrophe Calis,

Gen. 7. Vers. 11.

NOW if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; (for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species) which is granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fiftene Cubits about the highest Mountaines. Of this propolition, whether God hath so restrained himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the 40 Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoever was dispersit therein, pierced and brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had about one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth according to that circle seuen thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles: Take then the highest Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia, or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tennessy, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, reacheth about thirtie miles vpright. It is not then im- 50 possible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and fixtene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, and the waters drawe out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and about it, wee shall finde the difference exceeding great: If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a coniunction of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yet but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so 60 pleading) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Abacensis, to which I may adde Berensius and others, That such a coniunction there was, for shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Catastrophe Calis, or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needs no other answer then that obseruation of Ludovicus Placet, who affirmeth, That by the grauell Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524, there should happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Flood; then which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Petrus Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Catastrophe Calis, then that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sence of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For whosoever hath seen those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds doe not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windores or Flood-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrary to custome, and that order which wee call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith 10 Job. 38. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, for his mercifull goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was given to Ianus) because he beheld the times both before and after the Flood. Quia praterita nouerit, & futura profpexerit, saith ARNOBIVS; because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Ianus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the World: because as out of that confused Heape were drawne all the kinds of Beasts and Plants, so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Onid in the person of Ianus:

Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspice quam longi temporis acta cano.

The ancient call'd me Chaos: my great yeares
By those old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intitled Caelum and Sol, Heaven and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Verumnus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diod. Siculus and Alex. Aphroditus so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greekes called Liber ym, and his Nurfes Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne ioyned with the Starrs Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and euer after a Monument of Noahs Flood. He was also by others furnamed Triton, a Marine god, the sonne of Neptune; because he liued in safetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name of Dionysus, quasi diuinus, mentem pungens, Bite-braine, or Wit-slinger; though Diodorus conceiue otherwise, and deriue that name à patrie & loco, Of his Father, and the place of his Birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nysa, a Towne of Arabia felix, saith Suidas out of Orpheus. Hee had also the by-name of Taurus, or Tauraphagus; because hee first yoked Oxen, and tyllid the ground: according to that of Moses, And Noah became an Husbandman. Now howfoeuer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolne from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Boivus, was taken (saith Gal. Stuckius, and out of him Danvers) from Noachus, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of which Diadorus complayneth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was furnamed Nysus, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoever themselves saie of his enterprises: and these Mountaines of Nysa ioyne with those of Parapanisus, and those other Easterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserued, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuers and Mountaines; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noah in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptolomie, Danuis; diuiding Illyria from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Now in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the scriptures, neyther doe I finde any approved Author that hath written thereof: onely Genapius Becanus in his Libro Scythia conceiue, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountaines of Caucasus, because on those Hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the warre among a people, called Nysai, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials and Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar: To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himselfe from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God, and Noah was also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also he addeth the conueniencie of Riuers, to transport the Timber which he needed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only

Onely this we are sure of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World; and so my vnderstanding, not farre from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not vfe any Malt or Sayle (as in other Ships) and therefore did the Arke no other wise moue, then the Hulke or Body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a Wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the Waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible Winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundam planum, a flat bottom, and not rayed in forme of a Ship, with a sharpennesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Decubations Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes he arriued, was first called Larnassus, and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pausanias thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, the Inuentor of Auguration.

Pencerus findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinitie with the Greeke, but thinks it deriued from the Hebrew word Nahas, which signifieth Auguration and Dinination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the general name of a huge Frame; and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Arkon: but herein lyeth the difference betwene Arkon and Thebet, that Arkon signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it safe vpon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a Ship in this, that it had a Couer and Roofe, with a Crest in the midst thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House; to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himselfe and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomenesse of the many beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vfed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Geneua Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbins, Cedar; the Seucentie, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypres Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypres is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any special kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence. For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Aegypt the vfe to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes eate not; and he auoweth, that he saw in Vtica, in the Temple of Apollo Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1183. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrify or moulding in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete fauour, lasting also better then any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedars trees, as also in all the mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath besides the other commodities the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Percerius conceiue, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, and that the bottom had of one sort, the decke and partition of another; all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the Body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleane beasts from the vnclane, and to preserue their seuerall sorts of food; and that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, hee cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without without the helpe of a Compas, or the North starre. The Pitch which Noah used, is by some supposed to haue beene a kind of Bitumen, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodome and Gomorrah, now the dead Sea; or Asphaltes, and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely, after the manner of hard Wax.

§. IX.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacite.

The Arke, according to Gods commandement, had of length three hundred Cubites, sixtie of bredth, and thirtie deepe or high: by which proportion, it had fixe parts of length to one of bredth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AUGUSTINE: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, que sit salua per lignum, in quo pendit Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Christus Iesus: nam & mensura ista longitudinis, altitudinis, latitudinis, eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad hominem pronuntiatus est venturus, & venit, &c. Without doubt (sayth he) it is a figure of the Citie of God, travelling in this World as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saved by the Tree whereupon the Mediator betwene God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for even the very measure of the length, height, and bredth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath bene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one handfull more then the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Person Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth fixe common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens figures hath made the difference. For as there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length then it was in elder times.

S. Augustine considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost fixe of the Common: For measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacite of that Vessell built by Hiro of Syracuse, or the Ship of Ptolomie Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, upon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preferue all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kindes of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept living (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. Non fuit necesse conservare in Arca que possent in aquis vivere, non solum pisces sicut Pisces, verum super-nantia, sicut multa alites: It was not needfull to conserve those Creatures in the Arke, which could live in the Waters; and not onely Fishes which can live under water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra, non aqua, maledicta, quia Adam non huius, sed illius fructum vitium comedit: It was the Earth, and not the Waters, which God cursed; for of the forbidden fruit of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did Adam eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as aforesaid) that so huge a Frame needed not.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, we shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) have more of mischief and of ignorance, then of any reverend reason, finde many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kindes, were not then in terram naturam. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, eyther they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preserve them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyans, and the like; the one begotten by Ases and Mares, the other by Foxes and Wolves. And whereas by discovering of strange Lands, wherein there are found divers Beasts and Birds differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficiall consideration, that all those which weare red and pyed Skins, or Feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my owne opinion, I find no difference, but onely in magnitude, betwene the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; and even those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispagniola, with which the Spaniards used to devour the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolves, and begin to destroy the breed of their Cattel, and doe also oftentimes teare asunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude made a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which wee call the Blacke-Mores, non animala rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Giants of the South America should be of another kind, then the people of this part of the World. We also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantation, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Clymate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by often grafting, and the best Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcumbers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kindes precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to contayne of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance we cannot give to the difference betwene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 400. foot in length; and 100. foot in bredth, and 60. foot deepe.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not used in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Os, King of Babylon, had bene nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had bene Geometrical, then had bene 54. foot in height, and upwards, which were monstrous and most incredible: for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath bene nine foot long, and farre waighier and bigger then all Davids bodie, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had bene used for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe fixe Cubites of length, fixe of bredth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and so must their Priests haue ascended by steps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandement, given in these words: Thou shalt not goe up with steps vnto mine Altar, that thy shame be not discouered thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubites high, which make foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature; which measure (doublelesse) might giue much the more capacite to the Arke, although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this means there were not any whit the more room in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot be preserved in the Waters, might according to their present quappies be contained in a Vessell of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large Bodies which were in the dayes of Noah might haue room sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saved, (that is) seven of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke, Butao hath very learnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubits, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie Cubits, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubits, Jeweth the whole Contentie to haue bene 45.0000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to haue taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the roofe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500. cubical Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seekre roome for 89. different Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne; the Beeffe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Arifotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeces, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof sequen of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinds were taken by two of each kind, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twentie great Beasts cleane, and six and fiftie vn cleane, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeces; yet for a Supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued, as a hundred and twentie Beeces. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke fixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which deuoure flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to threescore and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storic or roome of the Arke, in their severall Cabbinets; their Meat in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.

A preterition of some questions less materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

N Hat time Noah took to build the Arke, I leave to others to dispute: but he received the Commandment from God a hundred years before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leisure sufficient. As for the number of Decks and Partitions, which Origen divides into four, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controverse: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Aligators) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I think it a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this fayth Forerimus, and others before him, that a Fish-pool might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crytall to receive in Light, and keepe out Water, were but to reuise the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is what part of the World the Arke rested after the Flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the terrestriall Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly reach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations, before and after the Flood; and all those, as well general as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah traualled to their first settlement and plan-plantation, I am recoiled (without any presumption) that therein the most writers were utterly mistaken. And I am not led to think out of my Humour or newness of opinion, or singularity; but do herein ground my selfe on the originall and first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke, sliced vpon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldee Paraphrast hath converted Kardû, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiæ in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordæ and Kardû, seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are; I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on the mountain Ararat, Armenia Nicolai Damasceni calls this mountain neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing : (to wit) that it fell down 10 that part of Arazar, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicodani Damaſcenus calls this moun-taine of Arazar, Barris, being the ſame which the Chaldaean nameth Kardis; to which moun-taine the Fryer Annius (citing this place out of Iofephus) makes him linde another ad-ioyning, called Ocala, and to lay that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did firſt take ground on this Ocala. But I doe not finde any ſuch mountaine in being, as this Ocala; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iofi- phus. Strabo remembereth a Promontorie in Arabia felix, of that name; and Plinie findes a Mart-towne ſo called in the ſame, which Ptolomie calls Ocilis, Pimeus Aegyls, and Nigor Zidon. But this Ocala of Damaſcenus, or rather of Annius, ſeemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Eroſtus calld thoſe mountaines of Armenia Gordiet, and 20 Curtius Cordas: Prolomie Gordae and Gordai: of which the Countie next adjoining is to this Nicolaus Damaſcenus called Nimada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Atly- ada or rather Minni: which word is viſed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Arminaea ſeemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we ſhould ſay

Minni of Syria; for that Armenia alſo was a part of Syria, Plinie whithſelleth. Epphanius the place th Cardyes about theſe mountaines, whom others call Gordien or Gordiun.
The mountaines are ſeated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the moun-taines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plains of Armenia the great, neere the Lake The- ſtiſtis: whence the Riuer of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, aid 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordai (that which ſurmounteth the reſt) 30 Epphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian ſignifieth a place of deſcent: but this our Iofephus; which name (ſaith Iuinus) was of the euent, becauſe of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this ſhall I take to be a ſuppoſed euent; ſeeing they him, from whence on euery ſide we muſt defend, may thus be called: as Iuinus corrects the place in Iofephus Kubaris (Kubari). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, becauſe Iofep. l. x. c. 4. ſayes, the place is called kubartipon (as it were the deſcent or coming downe) and Epphan. l. x. omr. Hercl. calls Menop: which word in the Armenian and Aegyptian tongue ſigniſieth deſcent, of Lubar, which is to defend; whence alſo Lubra is a Synagoge, becauſe it was commonly built on ſome high place: whereof alſo the Latin Delubrum may ſeeme to bee deriued; and Att. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Syna- 40 gogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath beene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of ſtrength by time; and allowance without any further examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwiſe rightly be giuen, eſpecially to that mountaine, by reaſon that the paſſage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, then to any of the reſt adioyning.

†. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would have come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

50 BVt there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Aburat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus; that it was in the 130. yeere, or in the yeere 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the noth of Babilon, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chuh, and Chaldaea. If then the Ark had first found land in Armenia, it is very improbable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could have spent so many yeeres in so short a pilgrimage, seeing the Region of Mezopotamia was only intersected, which might by all probabilities have bene past over in twenty twentie dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage the nauigable riuer of Tigris offered itselfe, which is euery where transpassable by boates of great burden: so as where the Defart on the one side resisted their expedition, the riuer on the contrary side serued to aduance it; the riuer rising out of the same Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, where the Arke of Noah was first supposed to settle itselfe; Then if the Nations which followed Nimrod still doubted the surpris of a second flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it foundeth ill to the care of reason, that they would haue spent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Mesopotamia, so called of the many Riueres which imbroyder or compasse it: for the effects witnessed their afflictions; and the workes, which they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe; being no sooner arriued in Shinar, but they began to prouide themselves of a defence (by erecting Babel) against any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the first known Citie of the world founded after the flood, about 131. yeeres, or (as others suppose) ten yeeres later: though (for my selfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two respects, first, to make themselves famous, To get vs a name (saith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vsurpe dominion ouer the rest.

†. IIII.

The second argument, That the Eastern people were most ancient in populositie, and in all humane glory.

FOR a second Argument: The ciuillitie, magnificence and multitude of people (wherein the East parts of the world first abounded) hath more weight then any thing which hath bene, or can be said for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vse of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the East had) may easily perswade vs, that those Sunne-rising Nations were the most ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the East Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make vs now to vnderstand, That the place of Philostratus in vita Apollonij Tianiensis. l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though exprest in fabulous words: when he saith, that the wise men, which dwell betwene Hyphasis and Ganges, vse not themselves to goe forth into battaile: but that they driue away their enemies with thunder and lightning sent from Iupiter: By which meanes there it is said, that Hercules Aegypti and Bacchus, ioyning their forces were defeated there; and that this Hercules there cast away his golden shield: For the inuention of letters was ignorantly ascribed to Cadmus, because hee brought them first into Greece: of which the people (then rude and savage) had reason to giue him the honour, from whence they receiued the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no lesse ancient then Seth or Enoch were: for they are said to haue written on pillars of stone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Eastern world it was that Iohn Cuthenberg a Germane, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being instructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gersona Frenchman, bettered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this mysterie was then supposed to be but newly borne, the Chinians had letters long before either the Aegyptians or Phoenicians; and also the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ciuill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue witnessed, who about an hundred yeeres since discovered those Kingdomes, and doe now enioy their rich treasures therein: for the Chinians account all other Nations but Saluages, in respect of themselves.

And to adde strength to this argument, the conquest and storie of Alex. Macedon may iustly be called to witness, who found more Cities and sumptuosities in that little Kingdome of Perse, which lay side by side to the East India, then in all his other trauals & vndertakings: For in Alexanders time learning and greatnesse had not trauielled so far to the West as Rome: Alexander esteeming of Italy but as a barbarous Countreie, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that stood in his eye, and the fame of the East pierced his eares. And if we looke as farr as the Sub-rising, and heare Paulus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vutermost Angle and Iland thereof, wee shall finde that those Nations haue sent out, and not receiued, lent knowledge, and not borrowed it from the West. For the farther East (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther West the more saluage.

And

And of the Ile of Iapan (now Zippingari) Venetius maketh this report: Incola religioni, literis, & sapientia sunt addictissimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more nostro) sacra in delubris exercent: vnum cognoscunt Principem, vnum Deum adorant, The Islanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philosophie, and most diligent searchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent then prayer, which they vse in their Churches, after the manner of Christians. They acknowledge one King, and worship one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuillitie, riches, sumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernment, is reported to be such by those who haue bene employed into those parts, as it seemeth to exceede (in those formerly named, and denoted other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

†. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull resistance which SEMI RAMIS found in the East Indies.

BUT for a third argument, and also of a treble strength to the rest, I lay the inuasion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduised Reader: who may consider in what age shee liued, and how soone after the worlds new birth shee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Ctesias reporteth) of more then three Millions to invade India, to which hee adioyned also 500000. Horse, and 100000. Waggones: whereof if wee beleeue but a third part, it shall suffice to proue that India was the first planted and peopled Countreie after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein shee liued: All Historians consent, that shee was the wife of Ninus; and the most approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cush, Cush of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at such time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then so multiplied and increased, the two descents cast betwene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time those multitudes, whereof her Armie was composed. Let vs then see with whom shee encountered in that warre with this her powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, then equalling her owne, conducted by Staurabates King of India beyond Indus; of whose multitudes this is the witness of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES, autis maioribus quam quae erant SEMIRAMIDIS copijs. STAVROBATES gathering together greater troups then those of SEMIRAMIS. If then these numbers of Indians had bene encreased but by a Colonie sent out from Shinar, (and that also after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke some time in the performance (this encrease in the East, and this Armie of Staurabates must haue bene made of stone, or somewhat else by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might easily grow vp in that time, from so great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as shall be demonstrated hereafter in the storie of Israel) so could not any such time, by any multiplication naturall, produce so many bodies of men, as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colones sent thither had bene so late as Babel ouerturned, and the confusion of Languages. For if we allow 65. yeeres time after the flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cush ere hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hamilab, Sabrab, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Cush ere hee begat Seba, and then thirte yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Seba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and fise yeeres to his hie elder brothers, which make sixtie fise, and then twice thirte yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Seba and Dedan with others, to beget their sonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty fise yeeres, there will then remaine fise yeeres to haue bene spent in trauieling from the East, ere they arriued in Shinar in the yeere after the flood 131. And so the followers of Nimrod might bee of sufficient multitude. But as for those which make him to haue arriued at Shinar in the yeere 101: and the confusion to haue bene at Pelegis birth, these men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrod's Towre in the Ayre; and not on those low and marish grounds (which require found foundations) in the Plains of Shinar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could be no confusion in that yeere 101. or at Pelegis birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vsurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after de Turris Babel.

lib. 1. 173.

after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of Babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLIcas) Hominibus in ea perficienda totis 40. annis incassum laborantibus, Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colonie was sent into East India; which granted (the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence) it can hardly be beleueed, that Strabon could have exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Emperesse of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

t. VI.

Fourthly, it is no way propable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, and had liued therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certain habitation: No; it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Westerne world; (which trauailes Noah put ouer to yong and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then covered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: for it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dreffe and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where hee should (if the tradition be found) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Triton; then into Spain, where they lay he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Noegla his sonnes wives: from thence into Italie, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Aegypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Gomer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say hee banishd him out of Italie. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For Ieruery reasonable man conceiue, what it was to trauaile farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and ouer-growne for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bulhes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, prouing that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italie or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue undertaken that vnbeleueing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and preualent perswasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, and by the authority which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoeuer they had vainely conceiued or feared, yet they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltye and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probabilitye, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers which came into Shinar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nauclerus and Calestius take the testimony of Methodius Bishop of Tyre for currant, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Suphene, and Ioclan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Ioclan of Sem, and Suphene of Iaphet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Ioclan, Hanilah, and Ophir, are especially noed to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sems issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning adioyning to Indus; and held also a part of Chaldaa for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till hee was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Ioclan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe, it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which moues me to beleuee, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the storie of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen seruant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had he not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested apart with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions: For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where he planted his Vineyard, and dreft the earth after which, and his thanksgiuing to God by sacrifice, he is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote: which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

t. VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor vpon Berosus: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested, as the Caspian and Cordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder, and also some place of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruallously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspys which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Cordias, hee hath no other shift to vnitethese opinions, but by vnitethese farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which, he hath found no other inuention, then to charge those men with error, which haue carelesly ouerseene, printed, and published Ptolimies Geographic, in which they are altogether disserued. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Villanouanus and others, we shall finde nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Caspys stand seuen degrees to the East of the Cordias, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authoritie Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Diodorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgment vpon the them in the like dispute. Aberrant vero omnes, non negligentia sed regnorum situs ignorantia, They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, he beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same hee citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagarenatum mortale genus, and that in Scythia the stocke of mortall men was renewed. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembered (who were so called, because suied from Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his Deucalions flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his venisse IANVM cum DVIR & Gallis progenitoribus Vmbrorum, From these Scythians, he saith, that IANVS came with DVIR and with the Gilli the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus origines semper Scythis tribuitur, Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Vmbri which long since inhabited Italie, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who defended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth, is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith a nation of Scythians called Araxes, taking name of the mountaine Ararat, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part (50 wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. years before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyed by his conceit of Armenia, by adding the word Saga, as in Scythia Saga renatus mortale genus; In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, he therefore in the Prologue of his Commentarie upon Berolius, teacheth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia saluatos. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is undoubtedly vnder the Mountaynes, of Paropamisus, from which, or near which it is most probable that the Arke first took ground; and from thence it attains (According to Aristotle) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Ammius hath, is out of Diodorus; where hee hath 10 read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name a Scythia Regis eorum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) we may see his vanitie, or rather (indeede) his fallhood in citing this place. For Diodorus a most approved and diligent Author beginneeth in that place with these words: Fabularunt Scythie, The Scythians fable; and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scythiarum origo & successus, fabula, The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomie doth directly delineate Scythia Sa- ga or Sace, and sets them in 120. degrees of longitude: and the Perfians (saith Herodo- tus) call all the Scythians, Sace which Plinie confirmeth: for in respect that these Sace (saith Plinie) are the next Scythians to the Perfians, therefore they give all the rest that 20 name. Now that any nation in Armenia can neighbour the Perfians, there is no man beleueeth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude, (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Sace; and the Countrie about Araxes Ptol- omie calleth Colchene and Sodacene and Sacapeone without any mention of Scythia at all:
and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either within Imatus or without,
to the number of 100. severall Nations are by Ptolomie precisely set downe.

But to come to those later Authors, whereby some have written, others have scene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Thorus Niger boundeth Scythia within Imaus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is alfo beyond our purpose.) Scythia intra Imaum montem caesi, que proprio vocabulo Caffaria hoc tempore dicitur: à Occafu Sarmatia Afratica: ab Oriente Imao monte: à Septentrione terra incognita: à Meridie Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, vñ que ostia Oceanum in Hyrcanum mare exeuunt & parte ipsius maru hinc vsq; ad Rha flumini ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the World, which in their owne speech is at this time called Caffaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Afratica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaus Mountaines: on the North by vñ knowne Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are the Saccæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger fets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (qua magna [sic] Regio [sic], & qua innumerae nationes conplectitur) Which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being between Scythia and Armenia, doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, he differeth Sarmatia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colcho, Theria, Alania, which he leaveth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Venetus, he hath not a word of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations; neither doth his fellow Frier John Plancarpio (cited by Vincenius in his description of Scythia) make any mention of Armenia; neither doth Istoyanus, an Armenian himself, of the blood of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) ever acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races descended: euer he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandment of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Mathias a Michon (a Canon of Cracovia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that traualled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Trauailes are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others he burieth that ancient and received opinion; That out of the Mountains Rhiphei, and Hyperborei, in Scythia, spring the Rivers of Tanus or Don, Volga, or Edel; proving by vnanswerable experience, that there are no such Mountains in rerum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fontaines of those famous Rivers are now by the Trade of Muscou knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marish grounds. The River of Tanus or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tula, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Iwanowsejoro, in the great Wood Okenitzkies or Siphanophles. Volga, which Ptolomie calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Fromow, in the great Wood Vodkonki: from which Lake the two other famous Rivers flow of Go. Sythiens (now Nepyr) and Dniuna or Doniuna. And this learned Polonius doth in this sort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the River of Vistula, the Name perchance mis-printed Vistla for Vislula, a River which parts Germanie and Sarmatia: and for the East border he nameth Tanus or Don. Sarmatia Asiatice he cutteth from Europe by the same River of Tanus, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from reaching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomie calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountain Imans. And the same Mathias Michon before affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Strabo would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatice it selfe about three hundred and a few odd 20 years before his owne time: these be his words: *Constat eam esse gentem nonam, & aduentum illam a partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus paulo plus abhinc trecentis annis) Asia Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East, from whence they enired into Asia, and gat new scates a litle more then 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Cobres or Poloos inhabited Sarmatia Asiatice. And this Mathias liued in the yeare 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Augspurg in the yeare 1506. as Bucholzerus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested, and the Scythia Saca were those people which liued at the North 30 part of those Mountains of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themselves with the great Imans. And were there no other testimony then the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomie, it is plaine, that betweene all parts of Armenia and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not one the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Aricea, betwene Taxartus and Iadus, but what are these Scythians to any Aricea, or Scythia Araxea, which Ammius placeth in Armenia, more then the Scythians of Europe?*

40 The fifth Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we add the considration of this part of the Text, That Noah planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the Fruit of the Vine or Raylin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a stranger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latiu: yea at such as Bromus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Cami) the Gauls remained between the Pirenei and the Alpes, nere unto the Senones, where they continued along time, untill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hastid to inhabite that Country, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeared, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from else where into Italie.

Now it is manifest, that Noah traueled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any consaile how to dispose of the World among his children : and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, and to planta Vinyard, after the Sacrifice and Thanksgiuing to God ; and whereſoeuer the Arke rested, there there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he tra-uailed farre: for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husbandman, & not a Wanderer.

Answere to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinaar, it doth not appeare; saying that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written:
So that the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinaar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turrem adificauerunt, alij si mam, quasi per eam caelum essent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if: they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens,

†. X.

An answer to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

BEFORE I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see and consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneva, the Chaldaean Paraphrast calls it Kardū; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat (which the Septuagint doth not conuert at all, but keeps the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenians selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, That the Arke first sat thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Moun-taines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Moun-taine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncouered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, wee might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybils it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seat of these Mountaines, and to proue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Caenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description the maketh mention of Marjay, a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Maander, which is farre from the Gordian Mountaines in Armenia. We may also find a great mistaking in Iosephus (though out of BEROSVS, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene ARMENIA and PARTHIA, toward ADIABENE, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Caron by others Kairor and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out, the people vaunt that they had in those dayes refered some pieces of Noahs Arke. But Parthia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Assyria: so that all Media and a part of Assyria is betwene Parthia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountaines Cordia was first borrowed out of Berofus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berofus, differs far from the wordes of that Berofus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Anniius. For Berofus cited by Iosephus, hath these words: Fertur & nauigij huius pars in Armenia apud montem Cor- diaeorum superesse, & quosdam bitumen inde abrafum secum reportare, quo vice amuleti loci huius homines vsi solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Cordiaean Mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they vse it in stead of an amulet. But Anniius his Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Berofus vseth these wordes: Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordia montis vertice quiescit, cuiusmodi dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tolleere quo maxime vsuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordiaean Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine, and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written. The ancient Berofus writes Cordia with a (C.) and the Fragment Gordia with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preseruatiue against Poyson or Inchantment; the other in Sacrifice; And if it be said that they agree in the generall, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approved Anthour: for one of them vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, thats it is said; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Ptolomie calls Gordia, are not those Moun-taines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Moschici. These be his owne wordes: Montes Armenia nominantur, qui Moschici appellantur, qui protenduntur vsq. ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryardes dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Moschici, stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryardes; which Mountaines Plinie calleth Pariedri, and both which lye to the North of Gordia or Baris, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordian Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Mountaines of Gordia, otherwise Baris Kardū or Lubar, (which Ptolomie calleth Torgodasion) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills then the Armenian.

FOR the best Cosmographers with other, that haue seene the Mountaines of Armenia find them farre inferiour, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedonia and Thrace, which Ptolomie calls Olympus, now called Lucas, (saith Castaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath beene seene in Armenia: for it calteth (hath three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of which Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemnia bonis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine ouertopit. Again, the Mountaine of Amanus in Mysia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration then any in Armenia, and may be seene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which Herodotus: Extat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculis mortalium peruenire non possint: Upon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is sayd to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discern the top thereof.
And if we may beleue Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which he ma-keth the most notorious both for breath and height: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui astitum ad ortum sunt, acumine atq. latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur vsq. ad
conitinium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu: Caucasus (saith Aristotle) is the greatest Mountaine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beames, vsq. ad conitinium (which is saith Macrobius) betwene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleue eyther: for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Teneriffe in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Sunnes company at any such late hours. Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus, are those which separate Celebia from Iberia,

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the River of Phasis riseth in the same Mountayne, which himselfe calleth Caucasus, and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which Iunder Colchis from Iberia, falling afterward into Euxinus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabesunda) howsoever Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this Storiewe should take Ararat for Armenia.

So as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: for the Bookes of the Sylbis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Basis was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the elevation and supposition haue equal credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should sit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Basis: for Basis (sayth Hierome) signifieth high Towres: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the name of Basis to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) then to any Hills of Armenia. For those of Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordiaz stand: for Ptolomie distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordiazans, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Paryardes, as aforesaid. Now Paryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Euphrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which diuoyne Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat.

Lastly, we must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it selfe, or else we must digge it downe, and carry it out of Armenia; or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinaar: or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more then any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spain is the Pyrenian; but as these being continuations of many Hills keepe one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomie both Taurus, Niphates, Coatras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imaus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxis, Cassij, Moschici, Amazomici, Heniuchi, Seythici, (thus diuersly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomie calls by one name Caucasus, lying betwene the Seas Caspium and Euxinus: as all those Mountaines which cut asunder America, euen from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imaus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imaus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of severall names giuen by Ptolomie was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disceur; as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Affryia, Media, Susiana, Persia, Parthia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Parapanisus: hauing

uing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imaus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles, as they sever and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which Iunder  Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amanus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imaus doth North and South. Though Taurus the Riuer of Euphrates forceth her passage, leauing the name of Amanus to the mountaines on her West banke; and on her East side the mountaines are sometimes knowne by the name of Taurus, (as in Ptolomies three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates: (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia: and after the Riuer of Euphrates cutteth them asunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Affryia and Media; but then they call themselves Coatras, though betwene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Oromes, and towards the East part Coronus out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradus riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania: and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and Hyrcanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus: (now Abia) and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Parapanisus, and lastly of Caucasus, euen were the famous Riuer of Indus with his principall companions Hydaspes and Zaradrus spring forth, and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equall the strong Hills called Imaus of Seythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140. of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanquer, and the rest Nagracus; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomie) that is, betwene Parapanisus and Imaus: and improperly, betwene the two Seas of Caspium and Ponius.

†. XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile

Now in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Imaus, and the Mountaine Nysus (so called of Bacchus Nysus or Nosh) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Coropius Eecanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best reason approued. In his Indo-Seythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of this subiect. And as the same Eecanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, and in 34. 35. and 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude are the most delicate Vines of the World, namely, in India, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana, and vnder these Mountaines, Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: and it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land by Moses direction found bunches of equal bignes at Escol. The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottom of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe and his Armie ten dayes together, finding therein the most delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a briefe repeating of diuers chiefe points.

And therefore to conculde this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also traueise Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name

name of Ararat. But as Plinie giueth to this ledge of high Hills, euen from Cilicia to Paropamisus and Caucasus, the name of Taurus: and as the Hills of France and Germanie are called the Alpes: and all betwene France and Spaine the Pyrenes: and in America the continuation of Hills for 3000. miles together, the Andes: so was Ararat the generall name which Moses gaue them; the diuersitie of appellations no otherwise growing, then by their diuiding and bordering diuers Regions and diuers Countries. For in the like case doe we call the Sea, which entreth by Gibraltar, the Mediterran, and inland Seas; and yet where it walseth the Coasts of Carthage, and ouer against it, it is called Tyrrhenus: betwene Italie and Greece, Ionium: from Venice to Durazzo, Adriaticum: betwene Athens and Asia, Aegeum: betwene Sessus and Abydus, Hellepont: and afterward Pontus, Propontis, and Bosphorus. And as in these, so is the Ocean to the North-east part of Scotland called Denealedonycum: and on this side, the Brittaine Sea: to the East, the Germane and Baltick, and then the Frozen.

For a final end of this question we must appeale to that Iudge which cannot erre, euen to the word of Truth, which in this place is to be taken and followed according to the plaine sense: seeing it can admit neither distinction, nor other construction then the words beare literally, because they are vsed to the very same plaine purpose of a description, and the making of a true and precise difference of places. Surely, where the sense is plaine (and being so vnderstood, it bringeth with it no subsequent inconuenience or contrarietie) we ought to be warie, how we fancie to our selues any new or strange exposition; and (withall) to resolue our selues, that euery word (as aforesaid) hath his weight in Gods Booke. And therefore wee must respect and reuerence the testimonies of the Scriptures throughout, in such sort as S. Augustine hath taught vs touching the Gospell of CHRIST IESVS (which is) Nequis aliter accipiat (quod narrantibus Discipulis Christi) in Euangelio legerit, quam si ipsam uanum Dei, quam in proprio in corpore gestabat, conpexerit; That no man otherwise take or vnderstand that which he readeth in the Gospell (the Disciples of Christ hauing written it) then if he had seene the very hand of the Lord, which he bare in his owne body, setting it downe.

The wordes then of Moses which end this dispute, are these: And as they went from the East, they found a Playne in the land of Shinaar, and there they abode: which prouoeth without controuersie, that Nimrod and all with him came from the East into Shinaar; and therefore the Arke of Noah rested and tooke land to the East-ward thereof. For wee must remember, that in all places wheresoeuer Moses maketh a difference of Countries, he alwayes precisely nameth toward what quarters of the world the same were seated: as where he teacheth the plantation of Isaïan, he nameth Sephar, a Mount in the East: where he remembreth Cains departure from the presence of God, he addeth: And Cain dwelt in the land of Nod towards the East-side of Eden: And when he describeth the Tents and Habitations of Abraham after hee departed from Sechem, hee vseth these wordes: Afterwards, remoouing thence vnto a Mountaine Eastward from Bethel, he pitched his Tents: hauing Bethel on the West-side, and Hai on the East: and afterward in the ninth Verse of the same Chapter it is written. And Abraham went forth iourneying towards the South: also when Ezechiel prophecied of Gog and Magog, he sheweth that these Nations of To, gorma were of the North quarters: and of the Queene of Saba it is written, that she came from the South to visit Salomon: And the Magi (or wisemen) came out of the East to offer presents vnto Christ. And that all Regions, and these trauailes were precisely set downe vpon the points of the Compasse and quarters of the world, it is most manifest: for Eden was due East from Iudea, Saba South from Hierusalem: the way from Bethel to Egypt directly South; and the Calestrians the Tubalines and Magogians inhabited the Regions directly North from Palestine, and so of the rest. But Armenia answereth not to this description of Shinaar by Moses. For to come out of Armenia, and to arriue in that Vally of Babylonia, is not a iourneying from the East, nor so neere vnto the East as the North: for Armenia is to the West of the North it selfe; and we must not say of Moses (whose hands the holy Ghost directed) that he erred toto caelo, and that he knew not East from West. For the body of Armenia standeth in fortie three degrees Septentrional, and the North part thereof in forty five; and those Gordiean Mountaines, whereon it was supposed that the Arke rested, stand in fortie one. But Babylonia, and the Vally of Shinaar are situated in thirtie five, and for the Longitude (which maketh the difference betwene East and West) the Gordiean Mountaines stand in 75. degrees, and the the Valley of Shinar in 79 and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinar North-west, ninety five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregorie and Nicome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima differentia omitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabe, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plena sententia sunt; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech, syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Atos teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Bezsius and Nicolas Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all aduenture. But this is infallible true, that Shinar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the flood; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah himselfe for an Instructor: and directly East from Shinar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouer-topped in number those Millions of Semiramus, proue that those parts were first planted: And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plaine termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinar, and there they abode. And therefore did the 20 Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the North-west, as Bezsius hath fained, whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say in the plentifull warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground and liued thereon. Placuit vero Noacho agricultura studium in quatuordecim: ipse omnium peritissimus esset: dicitur: ob eam rem suam ipsius lingua Latin-ADAMATI (hoc est) telluris vir appellatur cel-bratusque; The studie of Husbandrie pleased Noah (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANVS) in the knowledge and order of which it is said, that Noah excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his own language a man exercised in the earth. Which al'sheweth that he was no Wanderer: and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, and among men, 30 but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserue him and mankind.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the flood; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SEM, HAM, and JAPHET, by whom the earth was re-peopled.

40

§. I.

Whether SEM and HAM were elder then JAPHET.

These Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Japhet for the yongest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue, as by the examples of Enoch, Abraham, Jacob, and Dauid, is made manifest. In a few wordes 50 this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Genea, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Puto SEM alio the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of JAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius agreeing with the Septuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SEM alio the Father of all the Sons of HEBER, and brother of JAPHET, the eldest sonne were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Japhet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Japhet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet then for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly understood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the six hundredth yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the six hundredth yeere (to wit) the hundredth yeere following, came the general flood; two yeeres after which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the flood: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; and therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then beene a hundred yeeres old at the flood, and in the six hundredth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne so conuerted by the vulgar and Genea, Iu-nus turnes it filius minimus; His youngest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was disinherited, and lost the preeminence of his birth, as Esaue and Reuben did. Petrus conceiuit that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparative degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Sauour were defended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Genea, who agree in this conuersion, Shem Frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremelius, Shem fratri IAPHET maioris; or with Petrus, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus: inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Petrus qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the flood did not agree with the elder ship (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I do not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeeres old, and begate Arphaxad two yeeres after the flood; and againe in the 12. Verse: So Shem lived after he begat Eber, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres were alwaies precisely accounted.

§. II.

of diuers things that all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the World, as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of Ham.

BUT let vs go vnto the Worlds plantation after the flood, which being rightly understood, we shall find that many Nations haue supposed or fained themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoeuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath beene been borrowed thence, and therefore latter then it, as all careful obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Frame of his Chronologie: Moses is found more ancient then all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as Homer, Hesiod, and the Traian warre; and farre before HERCULES, MUSÆUS, LI-NUS, CHIRON, ORPHEUS, CASTOR, POLLUX, ÆSCULAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the Nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue seated in the top and highest Turrets of their Diuinitie.

For of the three Iapeters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Æther, Cicero de Nat. Deorum 1. 3. whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Ægypt: Eduxit Moses populum Dei ex Ægypto nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Ægypt, in the last dayes of CECROPIS, King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it selfe, but Tefeus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly prooued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut afunder the purpose in hand, by alleging many authorities in an needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

The Sonnes of IAPHET were,

First, we are to consider, that the world after the Flood not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wife Father, who knew those parts of the world before the Flood, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discoverers, or at all aduention, but assigned and allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Auery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Auery Sonnes, who haue no other end then to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Auugustus in the fiction of Æneus) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build heerein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First therefore we must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfull Vallies, with our owne barren and cold ground, informe our selues thereby, what wonderfull Deserts, what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, bryars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depreffeth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for onchall of the yeere in effect) yet in twenty or thirtie yeeres, these our grounds would not all ouer-grow and be couered (according to the nature thereof) either with Woods, or with other offensiue Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long & warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselves without contollement.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrod either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldaa; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first posselt; yet could he not enioy the lot of his inheritance on the Iuddaine, but by time and degrees. For we finde, that Abraham the true succellour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Pe; and from thence (called by God) hee rested at Charran in Assyria: from whence after the death of Thare hee trauielled to Sichem in Palestina: and yet there had passed betwene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neyther of themselves) seuen Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea, where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeares; and whence Nimrod went out into Assyria, and founded Ninive. Indeede the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Illues of Ham; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking lesse effect, vntill diuers yeares were consumed; and vntill the time arriued, which by the wisdome of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdomes of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in IAPHET's portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHET's sonnes TUBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

IN O beginne therefore (where Moses beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iapheth's sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phaleg's birth) in the yeare of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeare after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question eliewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iapheth were the Iles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands: adioyning; and compassing it about: Europe being all taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Aegum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediteran to the South and South-west, the Ocean to the West, and Brittish, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Iles lying betwene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Iles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Iles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young-ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dixitque Deus IAPHETH; Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Iunius heere vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilatet and the Genua persuaides; yet the Septuagint haue dilatet or amplificet; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories; but that thereby they should be made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iapheth's sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if wee may beleuee Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeare of Nimrod's Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie: which also Functius confirmeth in these words Anno decimo NIMROD, &c. In the tenth yeare of NIMROD's Reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeare of the same NIMROD's Reigne TUBAL seated himselfe in Austuria in Spaine (now called Biscay) which was in the 140. and in the 142. yeares after the Flood, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meanes to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Functius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded the Scriptures witness: Bu

the Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allow a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation answerable) that euer was. For where the vniuersall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would rayse their Worke about fiftene Cubits higher then the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with Waters of all the World: as by the great ruine which these waters forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approued also by the Prophet Hieremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou hast dwelt vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a rayed building on a marish ground: and to which, Glycys vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeares. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, So the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may bee gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Worke of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to bee noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newnesse of the World (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeares; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeare could creepe through 3000. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleuers, that neyther tie themselves to the Scripture, nor to reason, approue it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeares in building, or but neere such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1556. yeares, it were more then foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 131. yeares, and whereof they had spent some part in trauielling from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Worke 400. yeares (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourished in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plentie of materials and carriages: This Worke of the Towre of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeares remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a Nation or Family of men, with their Wiues and Children, and Cattell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and Desarts, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeares then of a 100. dayes. For in the West Indies of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entered the Countrey ten miles in ten yeares. And if Nimrod's people spent many yeares by the account before remembered in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betwene those places containing 36. Degrees, which make 720. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) and did all the way keepe the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betwene Babylon and Biscay is much more; for the bodie of Biscay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. so the length of way from Shinaar to Austuria or Biscay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod tooked diuers yeares to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles: or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little about 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary; but to allow as many yeares to Gomer and Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles to Countreies lesse knowne vnto them by farre; then the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee understood of most part of the World else it is vnknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine, in the tenth & twelfth of Nimrod's rods Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at one? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iapheth might come by Sea, and so save this great traivale through Defarts by Land. But we neuer reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people, as we may iustly suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleue, that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattell, by whose Milke they lived and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banquetting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Heards and numbers of their Cattell: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Droues and Heards of their owne, and their own Sheep-herds and Herdsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Paphlagonia, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouergone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Traff: past the Streights of Gibraltar, disdayned all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue fought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Asiay) by along and dangerous Navigation. But before the iourney of the Argonauts there were scarce any Vessels that durst crosse the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iason had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, and a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fiftie Passengers, yet it was farre greater then any of the former times: erat enim antes paruum nauicularum visus: For in former times they used very small Vessels. I deny not but that the Tyrians gaue themselves of olde to farre-off Navigations, whence Tibullus ascribed the inuention of Ships vnto them:

Primam tem venis credere docta Tyros,

Tyrus knew first how Ships might vse the Wind.

And for those Boates called longe naues or Gallies, Plinie saith that Agessius ascribeth the deuice to Paralus; and Philostephanus to Iason: Ctesias to Samyras; and Sapphanus to Semiramis: Archimachus to Egeon: to which inuention the Erythraei are said to haue added certain numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginians afterwards to haue brought them to foure Bankes: the Quinq. Rami first to haue bene vsed by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselves in the Punick Warre. But these bee perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cōt the deuising of these Gallies on Sesofris, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrahams time. So it is said, that Danaua was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Terullian (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians vsed to coast the Shores of the Read Sea vpon rasses, deuiled by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittans had a kind of Boat (with which they crosse the Seas) made of small twigs, and couered ouer with Leather: of which kind I haue seene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naues excoris circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith Tenor): of which Lucan the Poet:

*Primum canasale, madefacto vimine, parnam
Texitur in pappim, casq; induta iuuenco, Velloris patiens tumidum superenat at ammum.
Sic Venetus stagnante Pado, infuso, Britannum Nauigat Oceano.*

The moynted Ofsyer of the hoarie Willow Is wouen first into a little Boat:
Then cloth'd in Bullockes Hide, vpon the billow
Of a proud Riuer, lightly doth it float
Vnder the Waterman:
So on the Lakes of ouer-swelling Poe
Sailles the Venetian: and the Brittains so On th' out-spreed Ocean.

And

And although it cannot be denyed, when Nash by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first revealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference betweene the Arke of Nash, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattell: as also common reason can tell, that euen now when this Arte is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublesome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or vse of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer and Tubal had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred yeares after. Leaving therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioynd both Nature, Reason, Policie, and necessitie: and to the rest, neither probabilitie, nor possibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Meshech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezechiel, CAP. 38. 39.

Now although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath bene and is receiued: yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errors withall, so was he in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous, whereby both Eusebius, Hieronymus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for current, haue bene by him farre misled. But the better to conceiue what Regions of the World Gomer the first sonne of Iaphet posselt, as also Tubal, it is needfull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog, which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Matth. Beroaldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapter directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tubalines, and Togormians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheth Issus posselt, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speakes of) were seated hereabout, is my best appeare, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vniuing of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written; And DAVID my Seruant shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one Shepheard, (that is) they shall be vniued as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Vnion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to recieue to grace, and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cassians, next bordering Palatima, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia the lesse, which lay North from Iudaa. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, set thy face against Gog, and against the Land of Magog, the chiefe Princes of Meshech (or Mosoch and Tubal: and afterward; Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal: and in the sixth verse; Gomer and all his Bands, and the House of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the

Now that Magog is found in Caesifryia, Flinacaffirmeth, faying; Caesifryia habet Bambycem, quo alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syria vero Magog, Caesifryia hith in Bambye, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Magog. Hee further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Atergastis called by the Greekes Derceto, was here worshipped, that Lucian makes mention hereof, faying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yett hee expreffeth not; forbearing perhaps the word Magog, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleuee Strabo, then was Edessain Mesopotamia the same Bambye or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Orcelius is doubtfull whether one of these Auchours did not mistake the place and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the Race of Selenus. Now I doe not condemne the Opinion of Hermolaus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant that perhaps Magog might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Magog, the Nations of Caesifryia and the North parts adioyning bee meant by Magog: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to bee denied, that the Scythians in

lib. 4. cap. de

30 as of Tubal; from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spaine to search out the Mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderstood that it was a Southerly Countie and Mountaynous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witneseth in these following Verbes, telling how the Argonantes did visit them;

*Hac gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis :
Mercibus hac mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant :*

40      The Calybes plough not their barren soyle
But vndermine high Hills for Iron Veines :
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For Marchandize, which their poore liues sustaynes.

But it is more probable, that Spaine was first peopled by the Africans, who had ever since an affection to returne thither, and to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe over the Streights into that Countrey; and after by the Moors who held Granado, and the South parts eight hundred yeares, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, 50 then that in the twelfth yeare of Nimrods Raigne, Tubal past into Spaine, and therein built Saint Paul: a poore Towne; and a poore deuce, God knows. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosech or Mesech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mesech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their Assitants. And that Mesech inhabited Asia, Frantia (though he followed Ezechiel) confesseth, for these be his words: MESACHS, qui à Moïs MARECH, prisco: Moses ab Adula monte usq; ad Ponticum regionem posuit; hac regio, postea Cappadocia dicta est; in qua urbs Mazica, &c. hac est terra Macae principaliu MESACHS; ubi non Moïses habet MARECH, placed the ancient 51 Mesians

Mesians:

Cappadocians from the Mount Adulus, vnto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Mazica, &c. this is the principall Country of Macedonia. And this doth Annus also auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mesch and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spaine lying directly West, and not North from Indea. Alfo Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mesch and Tubal ioynedly. And for a small proofe, that these Nations were of a Northerne Neighbour Land (how farre fouer stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. I thou, and much people with thee, all shall ride vpon Horses, euen a great multitude and a mightie. Then if any man beleue that these troupes came out of Spaine ouer the Pyrenes, and first passed ouer a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sar-matia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellespont, or else compassed all Pontus, Euxinus, to come into the lesser Asia, which is halfe the length or compass of the then knowne World, he may be called a strong beleuer, but hee shall neuer bee iustified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucus was a Prouince neighbouring Palestina or Indea, and that Hierapoli (or Mages) ioyned vnto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Seleucide) and held it, till Scipio Asiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet posselt Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mesch be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tubalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Illic filled all Germanie, rested long in France and Brittain, and possessed the vmoost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancton well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Vmoost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherinto they might exorbiterate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their olde Language doth signifie Robbers; needline enforcing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the seates which they possessed. For that the Warlike Nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authoritie of Caesar affirming it is prooffe sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprizes not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those parts, which had formerly bene held by their Progenitours. I say not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of olde seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; vnlesse hee will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre parts haue invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument bee proued not to haue issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothes for his excellent wisdome surnamed Diu, whom Annus makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal (which Brother Moses neuer heard of, who spake his knowledge of Iaphets sonnes) they must finde him in some olde Poet: for Funthius a great Berosian, confelleth: Quis hic SAMOTHS fuisse incertum est; Vho this SAMOTHS was it is uncertaine; neither is there any proofe that he was that same Diu, whom Caesar sayth the Gauls suppose to bee their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confelleth with SVNCTVS: Mais ou ne sçait qui il estoit; No man knowes who he was.

¶ V.

Against the fabulous BEROSVS his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BEfore I go on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it necessarie to disproue the fiction which Annus hath of Noah himselfe: an inuention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authours of whom him-himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Laetius and others. For Annus seekes to perfwade vs, that Noah (surnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein hee liued 92. yeares. This to disproue, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to mee, if there were nothing else to disproue it. For if hee vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Abad, Chilme and Ninive by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts hee did in 92. yeares. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disproue the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annus groundeth, seeing so many learned men haue for demoustratiue proued that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Asyrian in his Oration against the Greekes auoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote only three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicanor: but Annus hath deuised five Bookes, wherewith hee honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled only the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians Annus hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if we may beleue Eusebius better then Annus, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Aeneas) consumed but 150. yeares: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Aeneas ariall into Italie there past 1226. (after the least by the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the Worlds yeare (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1664. and Noah dyed 310. yeares after the Flood: and so there past betwene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeares. For Saturius succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturius, Faunus after Picus, and Iatrus followed Faunus: which Latinius liued at once with Tautanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelagius of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these five Kings of the Latines hauing consumed but one hundred & fiftie yeares, and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fiftie yeares, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Ionnes, who were indeed the children of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, Hellas; which is the same. So had they Medus the sonne of Mada, whom they make the Parent of the Medes, though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Iapheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish Language hath remained among vs about 2000. yeares, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles, and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselves though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spaine, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Seythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue bene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spaine, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Gracian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeares (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinius the fifth King: which also Saint Augustine and Iulius confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disproue this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesta (others Camafena) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vestal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) so there is no man so impious, as to beleue that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and vngratefull, to set vp or deuise any Heathen saluage, or Idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any Ceremonie, contrarie to that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGORMA of the Posteritie of IAPHETH were first possessed about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread Westward into Europe: and Northward into Sarmatia.

It turne now to the sonnes of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessity taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere, it was in such a manner as that they might repaire to each other, and keepe intelligence by River: because the Land was yet Defart and ouer-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, and rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus tooke the South part of Chaldæa, downe the River of Gehon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoa neere the Lakes of Chaldæa, might by the same River get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chush: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Cushite, by whom the children of Shem (which came in to that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for awhile oppressed, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Haulab, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Chush, tooke both bankes of Tigris, especially on the East side of the River: by which River his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Haulab or Sufian, was anciently called Chusian or Chusan, afterward Sufa. Chul himselfe tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-west-ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Defart, where Ptolemie placeth the Citie of Chusidia, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tigris to conuiey them into the Persian gulfes, which walteth the bankes of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sonnes of Chush might take Land downe the River as they pleased. Also the Citie of Nimue was by Nimrod founded on the said River of Tigris; and from thence a Colonye past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seats in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward; into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Atagoe, and Tubal, fate downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phenicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatia. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cymmerians (witnesseth Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-greekes called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle so intituled. This Nation of the Cymmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gaue names to diuers places, as to the Mountaynes about Albania (called Cymmerini) and to the Citie of Cymmeri in Phrygia: also Eosphorus Cymmerius tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cymmerian: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberion; but Cerberion was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, fauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinas.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Melcheci. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Melcheci and Tubal. For these Melchi (which Ptolemie calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Prouince of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaynes Moschici, in the Valley betweene the Mountaynes Moschici, and the Mountaynes Pargardas: out of whose North part sprinketh the River Phasis; from the East part Araxis; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Melcheci are descended also the Moscouians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in proceffe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Melcheci (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging, or stretching forth.

forth. Togormas also at first did inhabit amongst his parents & kindred. The Togormians were also called Gibles; a people neighbouring the Sydnians in Gabala, a Teirarchie of Phenicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Malons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarta: of which Cities Tigranes subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one Hieropolymianus hath planted the Togormians in Barbarie: forgetting the propheticke of Ezechiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togormas, brought to thy Payres horses, and horse-men, and mules, which could not well bee driuen ouer the whole length of the Meduerran Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not denie, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spartans; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred yeeres after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Tewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Tegar. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirms, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Masconia. But for these subderrations it were infinit to examine them. Onely of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, and had not theretofore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could bee hardlie knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the same of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the rest.

From Madat the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Gracians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth son of Iapheth: and of Melch, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greeke Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esay: Ecce mittam eis quisque suam gentem, in mare in Italian, & Greciam; and I will send those that scape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italie and in Greece. The Genena here vseth the word (Tarsish) for Tarsus, a Citie in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places betaken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Genena vseth the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Iafte and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the fashon of that supposition, who so many yeeres preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Thessalie with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriving at Athens, hee was graciously receiued by Erechtheus, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom hee receiued two sonnes, Ion, and Achæus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus) who, when he had ioyned Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hic non sunt Peloponnesius, ass Bania; Thesie Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this is: These parts are Peloponnesius, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of the same affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece, which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was thereby transported. And though Strabo knew no more thereof, than he learned of the Greekes themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Herodotus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknewe, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, so called of the Mountains of Ararat which runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (sayth Iunius and others before him,) and Aram anciently taken for Syria, which contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phœnicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Province of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the storie of Jacob and Esaú, and call it Aram-padan. Then, if these two Nations were of the Armenians, and Assanes ioynd with them (who altogether united vnder Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erie much to call Assenaz Germanie or Almaine, for we heare of no swart Rutters at that siege. But the Assenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rhēgini; or of the Iews, who will have them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Alphath the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Berosaldus and Peterius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memorie of his plantation. But I like nothing to the contrary, but that he might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soile in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well vnder stood, that the Riphei were of Riphat, which the Greekes afterwards (according to Medes) called the Paphlagonians; and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Giants. These Iosephus called the Paphlagonians; and were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which, if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Eusebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rhēgini; or of the Iews, who will have them to be Almaines; when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Togorma, I have spoken already; now therefore of Iunus children, which were four:

Elisa, Tharfis, Cethim, Dodanim.

§. IX.

Of the foure sonnes of Iunus: and of the double signification of Tharfis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

Of Elisa or Elipha, came the Aoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Hellenes, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Aoles in Asia side: others of Elis in Peloponnesus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were descended in generall of Iunus, it is probable that the Aoles and the Elis took name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Hyacinthus & purpura de insulis Elisa facta sunt operimentum tuum: Blue Silke and Purple, brought from the Isles of Elisa, was thy covering: The Chaldaens for Elisa write Italia: but the Vulgar, the Tigurine, the Geneue, and Iunius, keepe the word Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe with reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italia in in those dayes, nor since, that I can reade of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better coniecture the Isles of Greece, and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: and before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Gætulia.

Tharfis, the second Sonne of Iunus, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharfis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharfis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (referring the respect due to so learned a man) he was much mistaken in that coniecture. The Chaldaean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharfis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is written, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharfis, and brought thence Gold, Silver, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldaean Paraphrast translates Tharfis (Africa). But Salomon's Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esfon Gaber, in the Bay of Elana, nere vnto Madian, where Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Province of Arabia Petraea, Idumea, or of the Chusites; and they layed to the higher part of the East India. For it had bene a strange Navigation to haue spent three yeeres in the passage betwene India and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, which might haue bene sayled in sixe or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprise of Salomon is in this sort written of in the list of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Name of Ships in Esfon Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyran sent with the Nauehs his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and set from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the world like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phœnicians knew no other Seathen that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharfis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Navigators in those parts with such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharfis vsed often for the Sea. And whereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon went euery three yeeres to Tharfis, that phrase is not strange at all; for we vse it ordinarily whereouer we nauigate, (namely) so that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeere, or euery three yeere to the Sea, and therefore Tharfis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharfis is truly taken for Tharfis, the chiefe Citie in Cilicia, founded by Tharfis the second sonne of Iunus, or by his Successors in memorie of their first parent. To this Citie arrived Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuer to bathe and wasse his bodie, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this Citie of Tharfis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For (Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iunus, who was to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore; gaue the Islands betwene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharfis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of whom that Citie tooke name.

The third sonne of Iunus was Cethim, of whom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Berosaldus, but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, who makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plural (saith he) and signifieth percussors, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Elai 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hae calamitas ubi Elai predicta est, qui capite uicissimo tercio inquit, venturus esse euerfices Tyri ex terra Cithim. This calamitie (saith Melanchton) was foretold by Elai the Prophet, who in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were to come out of Cithim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, which came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cithim might be taken for Italie, saith Berosaldus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Prophecie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrrians by Alexander, who after 7. Moneths siege, sacked that proud City, and cut in pieces seauen thousand principall Citizens; strangled two thousand and changed the freedome of 13. thousand others into bondage and slauey. Now; that Macedon was taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainlie in the first of the Maccabees, in these words: Asit that Alexander the Macedonian the the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Iosephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith hee) there remaineth the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Lactantius) which Citie Pintus vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also; and yet because Tharhis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly ouer against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharhis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, & that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece, were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies ouer the Aegan Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Iauan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) <sup>10</sup> fate downe at Rhodes, as neere Cethim, Tharhis, and Elisa, as he could. For Dodanim and Rhodanum are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebricians affirm. There is also found in Epirus the Citie of Dodana, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soile in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the Citie of Dodana, was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posteritie might giue it that name in the memorie of their first parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountains, Rivers, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children, and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many yeeres after: euery of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished: therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their owne names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountains and Rivers, as to things (after their iudgements) freest from any alteration.

Thus then did Iauan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands, and neighbor Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Iauans brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonia, Chaldea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the sonnes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylonia it selfe) trauelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the way of Aegypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The Sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Schem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterran Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sonnes of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

§. X.

That the seat of Chus the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Aethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Iosephus his Tale of an Aethiops wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chus.

That Ham was the Father of the Aegyptians; it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm verse 51. Then Israel came to Aegypt, and Iacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, Hee slew all the first-born in Aegypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great Citie in Thebaida, called Cherami: (as it were the Citie of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is Hebrici in Egypt the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradis handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Aethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther prooffe to the former. For the manifestation hereof, sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senselesse interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chus could not be Aethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petrea, and a part of Arabia the Happie and the Desart: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylonia to Nimrod, wherein they first late downe altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this Controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chus for Aethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Aethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. vers. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Aethiopia, thineth that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Aethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers Citie; and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she praied to betray both her Parents, Countrey, and friends, with the Citie it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it be worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he had described the strength of the Aethiopian Citie Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyses called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: Hic cum Moses desideraret exercitum otiosum egredi, Antiquae ferret, heste non audente manus conferere, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Aethiopum Regi filia, nomine Tharbis, &c. which Tale hath this sense in English: when Moses was grieved that his Armie lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not fallie and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Aethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour. And knowing that Moses had not onely up-held and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Aethiopians to the very brink of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, she made mesnes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliuer the Citie into his possession; whereunto she condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

This Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also utterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a Citie of Arabia for a Citie of Aethiopia: as he names Aethiopia it selfe to haue bene the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Aethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne teach vs, saying that the Sabeans are Arabians and not Aethiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus a Goer speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Presler John, of the Abyssines: wherein that Aethiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba, and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Sonne by that great Princeesse: which had it been true, it is likely that when Sihac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sackt Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioynd vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue bene an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Egypt, and neere Ezion Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinus Arabicus. For Edumam ioyneth to the Tribe of Iuda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And it we make the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, he had formerly liued foure yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his careful bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus confesseth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second, Therefore Moses fled from Pharaon, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Ethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, when Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law, Priest of Midian, and drave the Flocke to the Desert, and came to the Mountain of God in Horreb. Now that Mount Horreb is not in Ethiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleuee Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Countrey and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianite. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reuel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion (by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countreies.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rephidim, not farre from Idumea, and finding the insupportable gouernement of such a multitude, he aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Judges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had bene an Ethiopian, it had bene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandered foure yeeres, and did by these late trauiels of his, seeketh to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plentie and rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathen, and finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from thence might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris duas uxores habuisse Moysen, &c. Apollinaris also saith, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceiue these things saied by them? for it is manifest that the wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Ethiopia beyond Egypt; being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysostomus.

†. III.

Chusli expounded for Ethiopia, Ezech. 29. 10.

Now as Chusli is by the Septuaginta conuerted Ethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Ethiopia: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Ethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Ethiopia, Behold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come vpon vpon thee and vpon thy Riuer, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Towre of Senneh, even to the borders of the blacke Moores: which last words should haue bene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Senneh to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: betweene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Senneh to the Ethiopians, hath no sense at all. Senneh it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Ethiopia, or the Land of the blacke Moores. So as if *Nabuchodonosor*s conquest had bene but betweene Senneh and the border of Ethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory then the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betweene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies ioyneth together; or all the North parts of England, betweene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Senneh or Syene is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Ethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entred into any part of Ethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Genians, and all other (in effect) haue written Ethiopia for Chusli.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. ver. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And lastly, former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted: Et die illi egredientur nunc a facie mea in trieribus ad conuertendum Ethiopia confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Genians: In that day shall these Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carelesse Moores afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Triremes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should haue bene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chusli or Arabia for Ethiopia or the blacke Moores, euery man may see which meane vnderstandeth the Geographia of the World, knowing, that to passe out of Egypt into Ethiopia there neede no Gallies nor ships, no more then to passe out of Northampton into Leicestershire: Ethiopia being the conteminate Region with Egypt, and not diuided so much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should send Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by which an Armie might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Souerie (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan) which Armie might thereby surprise them vnawares in their securitie and confidence. For when Nabuchodonosor was at Senneh within a mile of Ethiopia, he needed neither Gallie nor Ship to passe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, then one In-land shire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancie to haue rowed vp the Riuer but for pleasure, he could not haue done it: for the fall of Azilut (tumbling ouer high and steepie Mountaines) called Catadupa Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselves as neere together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the Leffe; Saanan and his sons in Greece, and the Islands adjoining; Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons and Grandchildren of Chusli from the Riuer of Gehon (their Fathers first seat) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other contiguous vnto it, as Nimrod and Hanilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtechu (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treatie of peace, or other intelligence with the Ethiopian blacke Moores, as is already remembered in the Chapter 30 of Paradise.

†. V.

Apl. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chusli for Ethiopia.

And as in these places before remembred, so in diuers other is the word Ethiopia put for Arabia or Chusli, which puts the storie (where it is so vnderstood) quite out of square, one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For what sense hath this part of Scripture, Esay 18. Paterra Cymbalorum alarum quæ est trans flumina Aethiopia, or according to the Septuagint in these words: Paterra nauium alarum quæ est trans flumina Aethiopia? vive to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Rivers of Aethiopia, sending Embassadors by sea, even the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Ve terra umbrosa ora; vive to the Land of the shady coast, lush Junius. The former Translators understand it in this sense; That the waters are shadowed with the sailes, which are significantly called the wings of the ships, the other, that the Coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Esay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Esay repeateth, and by the former translation every man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported vnto the other side of Aethiopia, and Aethiopia set neare vnto Iudea, when it is the Land of Chush and Arabia indeede that lyeth betwene Iudea and Egypt, and not Aethiopia, which is seated vnder the Equinoctiall line, And of this Berosus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Rivers of Aethiopia. Nam de ignota agere non discimus; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an vknownne Region. Now if Aethiopia is to be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Jewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, a while beyond the Rivers of Aethiopia? except we shall impudently thinke that the Prophet spake he knew not what, or vied an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. yeres after, inhabiting as farre South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

t. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terrah in the storie of Sennacherib, and Zera in the storie of Ala are vniuersally made Aethiopian.

And by this translation is the storie of Sennacherib vtterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Sennacherib was first repulld at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iudea; when having certaine knowledge that Thirhakeh, (which all the Interpreters call King of Aethiopia) was on the way to set on him, he began to with-draw himselfe: and fearing to leaue his Armie in two parts, hee sent threatening Messages to Ezechias King of Iudea, perswading him to submit himselfe; the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: Huic aux of the 20. of the Nations delivered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur: where is the god of Hamath? &c. By which proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Hierusalem, he then meant to haue vniued that great Armie before Hierusalem, commanded by Rabsakeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, as was at Cirt vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Sennacherib had already mastered the most part of all these Cities in Iudea and Beniamin with a third Armie, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Armie led by their King Thirhakeh (whom Iosephus calls Tharsites) Rabsakeh hasted from the siege of Hierusalem, and found Sennacherib departed from Lachis and set down before Lebna, which was afterwards called Flenthoropolis, as some haue supposed. But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirhakeh, God himselfe whom hee least feared, strook his Armie before Hierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely writtten. And that this Armie of Thirhakeh was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe makes it plaine. For hee confesseth in the tenth Booke the first Chapter of the Jewes Antiquities, that it was come to Sennacheribs knowledge, that the Armie which was to it (both to releue the Egyptians and the Jewes) marched towards him by the way of the Desert: Now the Desert which lay indifferent betwene Hierusalem and Pelusium, was that of Pharan or Sar, which also toucheth on the three Arabies, to wit, the Storie, of which it is a part: the Desert, and the Happy; and by no other way indeede could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Hierusalem. But that there is any Desert betwene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet been heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Historian. So then this Scripture of the second of Kings, Verse the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chush) is also translated Aethiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse:

He heard also a man say of Thirhakeh King of Aethiopia &c. whereas it should haue beene thus conuered with Iunius: Audiam autem de Thirhakeh Rege Chush; Hee heard also of Thirhakeh King of the Chushites. For they were the Chushites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom, the very smoke of Iuda flaming was blowne being their nearest Neighbours: and so ioyne not the Aethiopian black Moores vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither war nor peace (which discovereth all Regions) euer found out, saith Plinie. For this King was no more King of Aethiopia then Zera was, who invaded Asia King of Iuda, with an Armie of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Armie & those Chariots should passe through all Egypt, (the Kings of Egypt being mightie Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, iudge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there euer such strength of Black Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Aethiopian such trauailers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zera also called King of Aethiopia. But the word Chush being first so conuered for Aethiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seats of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

t. VII.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esay, Nauium alarum; Winged ships, (for the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalorum alarum (according to the Latine) sailes whistling in the windes, or terra umbrosa ora (after Iunius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, is our Englishe Genesus hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ships, and we vse to say ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that they wanteth wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worn or too narrow; and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those small ships, as their sailes were laid to giue a shadow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Esay) affirmeth, that the word (Sabul) doth signifie both to shadow and to gingle (which is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (saith Pintus) is this: Voe to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, vnder the shadow of thy wings, which (indeede) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Esay: and this phrase is often elsewhere vied, as in the sixteenth Psalmes Sub umbra alarum tuarum protege me, Defend me vnder the shadow of thy wings. The Boates of reede (spoken of are of two kinde; either of basket-willow covered with hides (as anciently in Brittaine) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue seene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

6. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

t. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

His second sonne of Ham was Mizraim, (who according to the place of a second brother) was sent to seeke the further parts to inhabit. For Chush first possesseth Chush upon the West side of Ham the first, and from thence, as he increased in people, he came to Mizraim by him came to the border of the Red Sea, and to the South-east side of Iudea, Mizraim his brother (with whom hee past ouer into Asia). After him held Egypt; and Phut was a third brother (with whom hee past ouer into Libya). Egypt took the Sea coast, and held the side of Libya and Asia from his brothers possesse all that tract of Land from Gibon in Libya as farre as the West, on the North-east Sea, comprehending all Libya Desert, and part of all Libya which comprehendeth Gibon, Savaria, and and Judas; with the two *Egypt*s, whereof the nether is bounded by Memphis on the South; and by the Mediterranean Sea on the North: and Thebaida (called the upper Egypt) stretcheth itself toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the Ethiopian or black *Moor*s. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had no other Nation or Family that dwell betwene them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of *Noah*s children, fort themselves.

t. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

THIS flourishing Kingdome possesed by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, at such time as Aegyptus (otherwise Rameses, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother Danaus, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morea, by whom the Argives were made Danaus, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the flood, in the time of Iosua, as S. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in Homers Odyssey it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Occana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Apion) numbeth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who continued 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iosua, and about 1000. yeeres after the flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hycos, which he also calleth Pastors or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceived, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon saith: nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporarie with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Athenians and Acadians, who dare affirme, that they are more ancient then Iupiter and the Moone, whereof Ouid:

Ante Iouem genitum terrae habuisse feruntur Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Ioue was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true: seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Months, which makes after that account not about 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Months or Lunarie yeeres to haue bene of the first kind of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those five diuersities of their Lunarie yeeres.

t. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

GERARDUS Mercator in his Chronologie, reasoneth for the Egyptian Antiquitie in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptian times) had beginning with the generall flood: and that therefore the first of the same sixteenth reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which come came of Mercurius Perseus match this matter: That here in Mercurius was first deceived. Because he saith that he is gramed, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the generall flood: which Eusebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty being in number 179 in the time of their first King, which, to haue bene in the yeere of the world 1846, which

Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynasty was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynasty to endure 115. yeeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse then 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but fixe yeeres; the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to haue bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of falsehood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod with the sonnes of Noah came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: and that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor farre-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth yeere of Nimrods reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnadvised. For he makes Egypt possesed, and a gouernment established in the very fifth yeere of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neere in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them vpon all the earth.

t. IIII.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at least, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

BUT whereas Pererius seeketh to overthrow this Antiquitie of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I doe not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius; (so wit) that it was either vnlikely or impossible that Egypt should be peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Flood, I doe verily beleue the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primis mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptianam usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit. &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) we must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians, and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our sauing beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauiling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibilitie of vni-on, then out of stoward subletie, and preiudicate resoluement, to maintaine factions needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted to soote after Adam, no, nor at all before the Flood, I say that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, then to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double; & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and abilitie, to beget many Children: and at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinitie. And that there was a speedie increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue bene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues, built a Citie, (called Enoch) after the name of his first borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the Citie and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Pererius; and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancie of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so with in 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) aswell in Assyria, Syria, and Egypt might be posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Storie of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the Flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authoritie to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those multitudes, and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Armie of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well proue, that if the World had such plentie of people: in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus governed Babylonia and Assyria but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her invasion, some what lesse or more then 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronologie cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Armie, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short a time as can well be giuen. And if but one halfe be true of that which is said, That her Armie consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs be, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus having a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore he either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also be peopled. Now if we may beleue Troguus Pompeius (Epitomiz'd by Justine) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these be his owne words, speaking of Ninus. Euvre quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vxoris Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vxoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witnesseth, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Bactrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbereth: Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Storics generally shew, that though Zoroaster's Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater then any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for reigne authoritie? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was posselt by Mizraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure to prepare and cultiue a desolate and overgrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot be esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time then 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood; so as not onely Babylon and Assyria, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea the farre-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprest, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Flood? euen next flue, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially, where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till he had beheld living Nations of his owne body.

M

Selah,

† V.

† V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

FOR what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather then that they were not spread ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet we finde no want of people; nay, we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of foules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittain since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (slauing such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now aliue; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamie might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Giants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to be thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberal time which Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men carelesse of life, and fearelesse of death, then the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this enuious old Age of the World minglet together, and soweth with the seeds of Mankind?

Now if that Berofus or Annius may be alledged for sufficient Authours, whom Pererius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the Citie of Enoch was seated nere Tybanus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time, I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Prouince 30 of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berofus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berofus are not to be rejected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitium contraria; Let us choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berofus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berofus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof; as in the second 40 of the Acts, That there were dwelling at Iherusalem Iewes: men that feared God of euery Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berofus, it is plaine that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting, which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had bene inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to trauaile ouer before the Flood, then after it. For Pererius himselfe confesseth, that Atica (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was vninhabited 200. yeeres 50 after Ozyges Flood; whereby we may gather that there was no great pleasure in passing into farre Countries, after the generall Deluge. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumbersome to walke ouer, in the first Age, then after the generall overflowing.

Of the words of Moſes, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

LAstly, whereas Pererius drawes this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur talem divisionem non fuisse ante diluvium, By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weak: the Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: for out of these (saith Moſes) were the Nations divided in the earth after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these only. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or division in that Age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noah's Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary division controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never beene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplyed, Ad comparandas novas sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessity to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers with their increase for any long time: all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece, and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Lybia being also at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleue Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World, but (within 140. yeeres after the Flood) Spain, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 167. 6. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was overflowne, there were people in all the World which offended.

† VII.

A conclusion, resolving of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Lybia.

Therefore, for the Antiquitie of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, That Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillers or Altars (of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians hauing added to the list and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time (out of the vanitie of glory or by some corruption in their Priests) something beyond the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such fort preferred, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write that the vse of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Anniius findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christ his coming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the sonne of Belus, as aforesaid. Being diuided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surnamed also Delta: because the several branches of Nilus breaking alunder from one body of the Riuer, gaue it the forme of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran to ward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the Citie of Pelusium, where Semacherib was repulld: The other branch, which yielded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous Citie of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betwene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaida, of that ancient Citie of Thebes, which (according to Homer) was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Cuius centum portarum; and by the Greeks Diopolis: in the Scriptures No-hamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Iosephus calls Egypt Mesraim of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebaia.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Lybia: whose people were anciently called Phutes, (saith Iosephus) and Plinie mentioneth the Riuer Fat in Mauritania: which Riuer from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyrra) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush and Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleven sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

† I.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleven sonnes.

AMAN (the fourth sonne of Ham) posselt all that Region called by the Romanes Palaestina in the Scriptures Galilea, Samaria, and Iudaea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moſes, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou goest to Gerar vntill Aszrah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorha, and Admah, and Zeboim, euen vnto Lasah. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be conuerted, Moſes meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan and Zidon the North; Sodome and Gomorha the East, and the other Cities named Rood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vtermoſt Territorie of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sonnes of Canaan which posselt this Countrey, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number elcuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebus or Jebusam.
4. Emori or Emoreus, or Amorcus.
5. Gergeſus or Gergeſus.
6. Henu or Chineus.
7. Arki or Harkeus.
8. Seni or Simais.
9. Araadi or Aradaus.
10. Zemari or Samareus, or Tzemareus.
11. Hamathi or Hamathus, or Chamathus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Gergeſites, Amorites, Henuites, Jebusites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samareus, or from some of his.

† II.

Of the perians of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous Citie of Zidon in Phœnicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Aſſer: for Aſſer, Zabulon, and Nephtali had a great part of the ancient Phœnicia distributed among them; but the Aſſerites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those feuen principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, and the Hittites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hebron neere the Torrent Refor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vtermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus in Armenia) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, and Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarabs burial. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong and fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the Kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebusaus, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Iherusalem) were also a valiant and stubborn Nation, and held their Citie and the Countie nereit, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon.

Amorites was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Bisfan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations disperfed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Calefryia, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Juda, and in Zidmar neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hercof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genes the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oake.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Hewites, and Harkites.

The fift sonne of Canaan was Gergesens or Gergeson, (otherwise Girgazi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Ptolome sets the Citie Gerasa, which Iosephus calls Gefera in the Territorie of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the posseldest with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine filled with the quill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesens also built Berytus (sometime Geru) afterward Felix Julia, three miles from the River Adonis in Phoenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gaue many large priuilegges.

Hewites the sixth sonne, and Father of the Hewites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Hewites, howsoeuer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomie the second is remembred) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vterly to roote out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to afflict them: for as it is written, Judges the third: They remained to proue Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The feuenth sonne was Aracens or Hark, who betwene the footes of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the Citie of Archas, Arce, or Arca, afterward Archie.

†. V.

Of Sini and Aruadi.

Sinens the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparofsa, which Ptolome findes in Juda, not farre from Iebus; to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sinens founded Sim, which S. Hierome calls Sim; Ptolome, Simyra; Mela and Plinie, Simyrus; Brochard, Sycon, (called Synochis) neere Arca. Petorius thinks that Sinens inhabited the Desarts of Sinai, or thereabout, but hercof there is no other certaintie then the report of Brochard, who tooke view of all these places, affirming, that Sinens built Synochis, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C, otherwise Ketar) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinei were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinei, Balaam prophesied, that they should be destroyed by the Assyrians.

The ninth sonne was Aradeus or Aradeus, who in the Ile of Aradu built the Citie Gul Tyr. Arades: opposite against which land on the Maîne of Phoenicia, they founded another Citie of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this Citie came S. Peter (saith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skillfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Aradu were thy Mariners.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

Of Samareus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Calefryia at Edessa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samarajim (of the same Orthographic) vpon the Mountaines of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles c. 13. v. 4. which the Latine conuertereth amisse (saith he) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samarus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Plinie calls the Hemisseni, in Calefryia; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samarai, both the Hebrew Orthographic, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omir) disproueth: And he bought the Mountayne Samar or Shemeron of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the Mountayne: and called the name of the Citie which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samarai. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoeuer the Samaritanes were descended, Iure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the stars of the zenes stood vp, they alwayes called themselves zenes: when it suffered or sanke, they then vterly denied to be of that Nation or Familie; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Assyrians; and partly of the naturalls.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

The last of Canaans sonnes was Hamathus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath: (saith Beroaldus), of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whercof Hamathus was present. Iosephus and Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch, nor that Antioch with standeth on the River Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena: betwene the Mountayne Cassius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Selencis, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne: but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betwene

Apamea and Emefa in Castitis. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either : for both that Antioch vpon Orentes, and that which neighboureth Emefa, are farther off seated from Canan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali ; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emefa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea, betwene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon is selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could nor Epiphania belong vnto them : for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betwene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land : and therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthali, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnposselt, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder mount Heron, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vsed, that Emath was not in Nephtholim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel : because Dauid accepted the presents of Tob King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace : which hee would not haue done, if that Territorie had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomie, then might Emath bee comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua : for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Heron, which ioyneth to Libanus : and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19. v. 35. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beroaldus) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the Citie in Nephtholim should be written Hamath : and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Afedim : which Citie S. Hierome writes Emath, Iosephus, Hamath, others, Emathin, or Amathicos, and the people Amathin of which (as I take it) Ralsakeh vnteth in the second of Kings : where is the god of Hamath ?

§. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush (excepting Nimrod) of whom hereafter.*

The sonnes of Chush were,	{	Seba,	} And the sonnes of Raama were,	{	Sheba, Hauila,			} and Sabta, Raama, Sabteca,
		{	Nimrod.

¶ I.

That most of the sonnes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy : and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob : and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

Seba or Saba was the eldest sonne of Chush, the eldest sonne of Ham, to make a difference betwene Him and his Nephew Sheba, the son of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Ragma after Montanius) : his name is written with a single (S) Samech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) alperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chush, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma posselt both the shores of Arabia Felix. Saba tooketh that part toward the Red Sea, as neereft his Father Chush, and the Land of the Chusites : Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia, of which Plinie : Sabaei Arabum populi propter thura clarissimi ad utraq. maria porrecti gentibus habitant : The Sabaeans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to witte) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countie was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtione, saith Poissellus. To this agreeth Ptolomie, who setteth the Citie of Saba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Saba : for so much Montanius gathereth out of Ptolomie, because because he remembereth a Nation (called Sabai) neere the Persian Sea ; and Massabatha which descended of them. But Montanius hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama into Carmunia, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who onely attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Assyria. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabai, which stole away Iob's Cattle, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petraea, and finde our Iob in Traconitis, betwene Palestina and Celestria 1200. miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more then ridiculous, so do I thinke, that neither the Sabai on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any means execute the stealth vpon Iob, which soeuer Beroaldus shall take for neereft. But these were the Sabai of Arabia the Defart, where Guilandinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is seated : the same which Ptolomie calls Sane, now Semiscasac : and from this Saba in Arabia the Defart, came those Magi or Wise men which worshipped Christ, saith Melchior, whose words are these : The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostome, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happy, as many wise men doe beleene, but out of Sabain Arabia the Defart : which Citie when my selfe was there, was (as I indged it) called Semiscasac. And to approue this opinion of Guilandinus, it appeareth that these Sabai were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so disioyned with large Defarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the sands, and of the extreame want of water in those parts : Pbi nec homines, nec bestie videntur, nec aues, imò nec arbores, nec germen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperissimi ; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, nor so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but onely sharpe, and high stonie, and craggy mountaines. Beroaldus and Petrus conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visit Salomon, was of the Sabai on the East side of Arabia Felix ; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queene of Saba towards the Red Sea : for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petraea, twixt Idumaea and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Misian or Madian, and Ezion Gaber : and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trauaile enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

But to auoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Sabta, Raama, or Regma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the posseltors of Arabia the Happy, and the Defart : onely Hauilah and Nimrod dwelt together on the East side Chush, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Sabta, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the same Arabia : of which both Plinie and Ptolomie ; who withall nameth Sabotale, plin. l. 12. c. 11. Prob. l. 6. c. 11. within the walls whereof there were sometimes found fixtie Temples. Ezekiel ioyneth the Father and the Sonne together, The Merchants of Sheba and Raama were thy Merchants. And that they were the Easterne Arabians their merchandise witnesseth, formerly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the Athiopians about Aeroe, and Sabta of the Athiopians Aslabari, they be not worthie any farther answer then hath already beene giuen : especially seeing these Cities preferring the memorie of the names of Saba, and of Sabta in Arabia were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Chush, with little alterations are preferred. In Arabia the Defart is found the Citie Saba or Sauc, (now Semiscasac) with the Citie of Rhegama for Rhegma ; and the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Raamani of Raamah. In Arabia the happy is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana ; which also keepeth the found of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptah, not farre from the East-coast of Arabia : as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the body of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabbatha ; and to the West of Sabbatha towards the Red Sea the great Citie of Saba ; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai : and to the South thereof againe toward the streight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hauilah by the passage of Tigris was a neighbour, to whom hee might passe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, set neere the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which Rood in Ptolomies time.

¶ II.

t. II.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chusht to haue bene seated in the West Æthiopia, disproued out of Ezech: and Hieremie.

And whereas Iosephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious here in) sent Dedan the sonne of Raamah into West Æthiopia, it is strange that Ezechiel should couple Sheba, Raamah and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verse, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verses, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in West Æthiopia, which is distant from Raamah and Sheba (the habitation of his father and brother) about foure thousand miles. Besides which, the merchandise that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moores. For they of Dedan (saith Ezechiel) were thy Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and these Westerne Æthiopsians neuer saw cloth, till the Portugals seeking those Coasts, traded with them: the merchandise of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, some Gold and Amber, Ciuets, Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all these they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in those dayes the West part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negros of the West Æthiopia, which inhabit about Serra Lioa, or Niger, could either passe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, were a strange, or rather a foolish fancie. Now to put it out of dispute that Dedan also dwelt by the rest of the children of Chusht, which seates they held by that name in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremie his owne words: Fly, yee Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the destruction of Elaw upon him. Hereby it appeareth that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumæans: and Idumæa is a Prouince of Arabia Petraea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia Felix, ioyned in that part to Petraea, the seat of his Grand-father Chusht; which neighbourhood and fellowship of Dedan and the Idumæans, is also confirmed by Ezechiel: I will stretch out my hand upon Edom, and destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Edom shall fall by the sword.

Ezech. cap. 35. destroy Man and Beast out of it, and I will make it desolate from Teman: and they of Edom shall fall by the sword.

S. XIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Vers. 7.

After Chusht it followeth to speake of Mizraims sonnes, whose names (saith S. Augustine) were plurall, to signifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder sonne of Mizraim, was the father of the Lybians in Africa: and the rest of his brothers dispersed themselves into all the Regions adioyning. Among the sons of Shem there is also Lud; but hee is differenced from Lud the sonne of Mizraim by the singular number: the sonne of Shem being written Lud, the sonne of Mizraim, Ludim: and yet these Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the sonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was seated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremie, who ioyneth them in this sort together: Come up ye Horses, and rage ye Chariots, and let the valiant men come forth, the Black-moores, and the Lybians which beare the shield: for those Nations assisted the Ægyptians being of one parent descended. And in Ezechiel, Phut & Lud are ioyned together. Æthiopia (or Chusht) saith Ezechiel, c. 30. v. 3. And Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league shall fall with them by the sword: which is as much to say, as the sons of Chusht; (which were the Chushtes) the sonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Ægyptians) and the Lybians (descended of his sonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Ægypt and Africa shall fall together. Hierosolymitanus findes also in Africa a Nation of the Lydians. And I beleeue it: because Hieremie ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembered. But Lybia in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (saith Arias Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they seeme to be called Lubim or Lubai, a name somewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may seeme that the truer writing writing is, not Lybes, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderstandeth that which is spoken in the third Verse of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant against the people of Lyda, a Citie (saith he) between Ægypt and Palestina, which opinion I could not milike if the Citie of Lyda were so seated. But Lyda (which should be written Lydda with a double D, and is the same Citie which was afterward Diospolis, in which S. Peter cured Aenes of the palsy) standeth neere the Torrent Gaar, not farre from Ioppe the Port of Hierusalem. Yet is it not impossible but that this Citie might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre asunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, manie Cities called Alexandria, Selencia, and Antiochia, so of diuers others. S. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third sonne of Mizraim: and so doth Possellus; and either opinion may be true.

The termination in the Hebrew, is commonly a signe of the plurall number, as in the word Lud.

Cap. 45. v. 3.

The rest of Mizraims sonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, sauing Casulubim and Caphthorim, of whom came the Philistims, whom the Scriptures call Peleset.

These Casulubim inhabited Castritis, a Region lying in the entrance of Ægypt from Palestina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Casius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphthorim located neere Casulubim in that Tract of Ægypt called Sethrotis, not farre from Pelusium. Strabo callit Sethrotis; Stephanus and Plinius, Sethrotis, of the Citie Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the same which Ptolemie calls Hercules parua. Of the Casulubim and Caphthorim came the Philistims, which are called by the Septuagint Allophyls (which is) Alienigenæ, Strangers, or of a strange kindred. These Philistims inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Ægypt, of whom Palestina took name. For the Hebrews (saith Isidore) doe not vie the letter (P) but in stead of it (ph). Their principall Cities were Gaza, Ascalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gassai, Ascalonites, Azotij, Gethij, and Accaronites. Isidore affirmes, that Ascalon was first called Philistim: and of that Citie the Countrey adioyning. But where Isidore had it, I know not.

The first knowne King of the Philistims was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abraham's wife, with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was also King of the Philistims, in these words: wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philistims vnto Gerar. Now in regard that this or some auienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glorie, the rest of his successors called themselves by the same name. The Philistims commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Castle of Pilgrims (otherwise Casarea Palestina, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the Riuer of Ægypt. The Anakims or strong Gyants were of these Philistims: and Gath was of Geth one of the five Cities abouenamed. They had sometimes five Kings, saith Lysanias. They mastered the Israelites at several times about 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Samson and Sammuel, but in the end this yoke was taken off by Dauid and laid on themselves.

It is objected, that because these Cities and the Countrey adioyning, were lieth by the sonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Israelites dispossesse the sonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing those places.

To this saith Pererius, that although the Palestines or Philistims held it in the time of Iosua, yet at the time of the promise it was possesed by the Canaanites, as in the second of Deuteronomie. The Hemites dwelt in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if the Canaanites being the greater part, the denomination were from them? For that the Philistims were of Caphthor, and so of Mizraim and not of Canaan, besides Moses, the Prophet Hieremie witnesseth: The Lord will destroy the Philistims: the remnant of the issue of Caphthor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philistims are said to be the reliques of Caphthorim: Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Ægypt, and the Philistims from Caphthor and Atam from Kir? so I reade this place with diuers of the learned. For whereas the Vulgar hath, ex Palestina de Cappadocia, ex Syris de Cyrene, this conuersion Beroaldus condemneth; where Caphthor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a Citie directly West from Ægypt, betwene Ptolemais or Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Asia vnder the Assyrians: Bunius hath it Kir; and not Cyrene: and so hath the Geneat.

But

Cap. 15. v. 9.

But Peterius calls Capherim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: and yet it is not altogether improbable if he meane Cappadocia in Palaestina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palaestina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglaiphassar King of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir, for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media superior: for it was the manner and policie of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

§. XV.
Of the Issue of Sem.

t. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sonnes of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

He posteritie of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them hee proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Storie of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearfall of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Ninive) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauiug India) which I beleuee Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hanilah the sonnes of Isachar afterward repayed. Hij filij Sem ab Euphrate fluuij partem Asia usq. ad Oceanum Indicum sennerunt; These sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all those Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then beganto be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchie being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the Kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel: ) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susan, which is in the Province of Elam. This Citie is embraced by the River Euleus (according to Ptolomie) in Daniel, and seated in the border of Susiana. Assur (as most Historians beleuee) the second sonne of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdayning the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Ninive, of equal beautie and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion. Every mans hand hath bene in this Storie, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: for the Assyrians so often invaded and spoyled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Diuine and Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howsoever Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honor this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfull Princes among them, had yet the Mountaine Taurus for the vmoost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Ezay the 37. Haue the gods of the Nations delivered them? whom my Fathers haue destroyed? at Gozan, and Haran, and Refeph, and the children of Eden which were at Telsassar. where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the Citie Sepharuaim, Hena and Iuah? All these were indeede but pettie Kings of Cities, and small Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Refeph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Ituraea, vnder Libanus: the Ile of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palestina and Phoenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because he established the first Empire from whom the most memorable storie of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus, but it must bee those Chaldeans about Yr: for the sonnes of Cham possesse the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela; and Shela, Heber; of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth Sonne of Sem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

t. II.
Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fifth and last Sonne of Sem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syru (saith Ensebius Ezay 7. v. 8. out of Iosephus) which Syru liued before Moses was borne, the same which others call Euse. p. 10. 8. the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Nabarajm, which is as much to say, as Syria duorum fluminum, Syria compassed with two Rivers: (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Reub) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembreth it by the ancient name of Aram (to Deut. 23. 4. or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witnesseth: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi iudei. Syri Aramensis or Arameos vocant; These which we call Syrians (saith he) themselves call Arameni and Arameans. Psalm 137. Strabo l. 12.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generall; (and not onely of those in Syria Inter-amni, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Genes. 22. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the original read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the Historie of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's Posteritie could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Nabarajm, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinkes in his note vpon Gen. 25. 26. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomie calls Anabaria (so called from the River Chaboras, which diuiding it runneth into Euphrates the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Nabarajm (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehends the whole Mesopotamia) may seeme to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Rivers, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomie, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

But Iofatus mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Zyza, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abraham his ward Eliezer was the Founder thereof; though it were likely that Hu the eldest sonne of Aram dwelt neere vnto his father, who inhabited the bodie of Syria. For Hu was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desert, and to Batanea or Traconitis: whereof the Prophet Hieremie: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter 10 of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hu. Hu therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Traconitis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Batanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Sir to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: hauing in it many Citie and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremie: And all sorts of people: and all the Kings of the Land of Hu. In this Region dwelt Iob, descended of Hu, the sonne of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Jacob, saith Philos.

C. 27. v. 20.

Hul the second sonne of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third sonne, parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disprove, though I see no reason why Gether should 20 leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the Iesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as farre as Euphrates, where Plolomey setteth the Citie of Cholle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians; but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carrie them farre away in all haste. For mine owne opinion I alwaies keepe the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius: (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neere his brothers, in the bodie of Syria, and in the Province of Cassiotis, and Seleucia, where Plolomey placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Plinie called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mefch the North part of Syria, betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neere the Mountaine Mafius. The certaintie of those Plantations can no other- 30 wise be knowne then by this probability, that Aram the father (of whom that great Region tooke name) planted his sonnes in the same Land about him: for hee wanted no scope of Territorie for himselfe and them; neyther then when the World was newlie planted, nor in many hundred yeres after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desert parts of the World, so farre asunder. And as necessitie and policie held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sonnes of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome; yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, and to themselves; giuing to the Citie therein built their owne names, thereby to leaue their 40 memorie to their Posteritie: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and displaining the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as (Nova Hispania and Pera excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. §. 7.

Mes the fourth sonne is made the parent of the Maenians: of whom something hath bene spoken already. Arphaxad the third sonne of Schem, begat Shelah, and Iteber. Heber had two sonnes, Phaleg and Isachan: and in *Phaleg*s time was the Earth diuided. 50

t. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the diuision (at *Phaleg*s birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at cyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirme that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeere after the Flood 101. and liued in all 239. yeeres, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeeres after the Flood, ere the children of Noah leuered themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeeres as 101. (the time of *Phaleg*s birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, that if 70. persons of the Familie of Jacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeeres, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so loone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God, Increase and multiplie, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeeres time: and the sonnes of Noah were but three, and had but 101. yeeres of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg took that name after the diuision, in memorie thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at *Phaleg*s death (which hapned in the yeere, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12. yeeres before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeeres after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeeres: in the 43. yeere of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeeres before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Ariamus King of Arabia a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq. armis præstabant, Exceeded both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Citie in Armenia; receiued Barzanes into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions betwene Nilus and Tanais, the Aegyptians, Pharicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyracanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000. proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered then by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the verie instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoeuer mens opinions haue bene herein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confu- 50 sion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeere 101. after the Flood, which was the yeere that Nimrod came into Shinaar, or tenne yeeres after hee arriued, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene giuen him at the time of this confu- sion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Jacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angell; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esa; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deferred any such honour, if hee had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and dispercion followeth increase of people of necessitie; and this Prophecie (if any such had bene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and Citie of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue prooffe) might be increased: and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

The sonnes of Ioctan were Althoſe ſonnes of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the Eaſt parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Cophe or Choas, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

But the certaine places of thoſe thirteen Sonnes cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Melba as thou goeſt vnto Separ a Mount in the Eaſt. Of all theſe thirteen Sonnes, there were only three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whoſe names, to auoid confuſion, it is to be obſerued, that among the ſonnes of Chufh, two of them had alſo the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had alſo a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the ſonne of Chufh, and Sheba the ſonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauilah the ſon of Chufh vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as ſome haue thought) the Father of the Sabaens in Perſia: of which Nations Dionyſius de Orbis ſitu, maketh mention. Primum Sabai; poſt hoc ſunt Paſſagarda; prope verò hoſ ſunt Taſci, The firſt are Sabaens: after theſe be Paſſagarda, and neere theſe the Taſci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and ſent them away from Iſaac his ſonne (while he yet liued) Eaſtward to the Eaſt-Country: heereupon it is ſuppoſed, that this Saba the ſonne of Abraham wandered into Perſia: for Perſia was accounted the furthermoſt Eaſt-Country in reſpect of Iudea; which alſo Ouid ſetteth vnder the Sun riſing. Yet ſeeing the reſt of Abraham's ſonnes ſeated themſelues on the borders of Iudea, I rather chooſe to leaue Saba the ſonne of Abraham in Arabia the Deſart, where Ptolomie ſetteth a Citie of that name.

But Saba the ſonne of Ioctan, the ſon of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it ſelfe. For Dionyſius Afer in his Periegeſis, (or deſcription of the World) which hee wrote in Grece Verſe, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabai. Taxilis hoſ inter medios habitat Sabai: In the middeſt of theſe dwell the Sabai, and the Taxili, ſayth this Dionyſius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Ioctan's ſonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir alſo was an Inhabitant of the Eaſt India, and (as Saint Hierome vnderſtands it) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now knowne by the name of Molucca. Iofephus vnderſtands Ophir to be one of thoſe great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Cherſoneſi, or Peninſula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut, and Malacca. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he ſets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccas farther Eaſt.

Aridi Montanus bur of the ſecond of Chronicles, the third Chapter and ſixth Verſe, gathereth that Ophir was in Camaria, looking into the Weſt Ocean, commonly called Mare del Sur, on the South Sea; by others Mare Pacificum. The words in the ſecond of the Chronicles are theſe: And theſe vnderſayd the ſonne with precious ſtones, for beaſties, and the gold was gold of Paruaim. Iunius takes this gold to be the gold of Hauilah, remembered by Moses in the deſcription of Paradiſe: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Province of Suſiana called Barbatia, ſo called (as he thinks) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence thoſe Kings ſubjected by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they preſented him; and which Dauid preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

But this fance of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Pleſis, who alſo tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this queſtion may be a ſubiect of no further diſpute, it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: ſure I am that at leaſt America hath none, no nor any Citie, Village, or Mountaine ſo called. But when Francis Piſarro firſt diſcouered thoſe Lands to the South of Panama, arriving in that R. gion which Atabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) ſome of the Spaniards vterly ignorant of that language, demanding by ſignes (as they could) the name of the Countrey, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in generall. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderſtood them, ſet it downe in the Diurnall of their enterpriſe, and ſo in the firſt deſcription made, and ſent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that Weſt part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer ſince as diuers Spaniards in the Indies aſſured me; which alſo Acoſta the Ieſuite in his naturall and morall Hiſtorie of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus alſo findeth, that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Ioctan, who as hee ſuppoſeth navigated from the vernoſt Eaſt of India to America: it is moſt true, that Iucatan is nothing elſe in the language of that Countrey, but [what is that] or [What ſay you?] For when the Spaniards aſked the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) what aſke you, or What ſay you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountaynous Country on the South ſide of Trinidad & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of thoſe new Regions which they diſcouered, pointed to the Hills a farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to ſay, as high Hills or Mountaynes. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan: from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South, and ſo hath that Countrey euer ſince retained the name of Paria.

The ſame hapned among the Engliſh, which I ſent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuile to inhabit Virginia. For when ſome of my peopleaſked the name of that Countrey, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to ſay as, You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The ſame hapned to the Spaniard in aſking the name of the Iland Trinidad: for a Spaniard demanding the name of that ſelfe place which the Sea incompaſſed, they answered, Cacri, which ſignifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newlie diſcouered bene intituled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee muſt leaue Ophir among the Moluccas, whereabout ſuch an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it ſelfe (towards Perſia) in Hauilah, now Suſiana, and all alongſt that Eaſt Indian ſhore, yet the greateſt plenty is taken vp at the Philippines, certayne Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the Eaſt India. And by the length of the paſſage which Salomons ſhips made from the Red Sea, (which was three yeeres in going and coming) it ſeemeth they went to the vernoſt Eaſt, as the Moluccas or Philippines. Indeede theſe that now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finiſh that nauigation in two yeeres, and ſometimes leſſe: and Salomons ſhips went not about a tenth part of this our courſe from hence. But wee muſt conſider, that they euermore kept the coaſt, and crept by the ſhores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vſe of the Compaſſe was knowne, it was impoſſible to nauigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ſhips could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bene for the plenty of gold in the East India Ilands, farre about the mines of any one place of America) to saile euery yeere from the West part of America thither, and thereto haue strongly planted, and inhabited the richest of those Ilands: wherein they haue built a Citie called Amulio. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off then Ophir in the East, to haue sped worse: neither could he nauigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas hee had no coast to haue guided him.

Tolians also gathereth a fantastickall opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Countrey, whose Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaynes Salomon affirmeth to bee in Scythia Asiatia, in these wordes: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griffes tenent vniuersa, alites feracissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these 10 Countreies abound in gold, and rich stone, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue bene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristotellus make mention: and so doth Plinius, lib. 6. Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus & D. Sculau in the Story of Alexander Ma- cedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying one-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vied to weare a vizard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eyes; and not that they had by nature any such defect. But Salomon borroweth these things out of Plinie, who speaks of such a Nation in the extreame North, at a place called Gislotron, or the Caeue of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deuiued of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason and vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be faigned in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might be auowed. For there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lyons, and other rauinous and cruell beasts: vnto which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be sure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seeked to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their yong-ones, they grow enraged and aduenturous. Inlike fort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vpon by them, when they diue for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde fauour in the fish and bloud of the Indians, whom they deuoure. 40

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Scapher named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Hauilah, it is meant by Hauilah in the East India, which tooke name of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Pisón compasseth, was so called of Hauilah, the sonne of Chus, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: Sauis fecit ibi Amalecites from Hauilah, no shon commisit to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Sauis made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three, Saba, Hauilah, & Ophir, though at the first seated by their brethren about the hill Mafius or Medis, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, yet at length either themselves or their issues remooued into the East India, leaving the other other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countreies of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue bene from Mesopotamia to Sephar. And although S. Hierome take Mes to be a Region of the East India, and Sephar a Mountaine of the same (which Mountaine, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to India, is neuer farther extended then into Persia. But Mes is that part of the Mountaine of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuier Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charran: and in the same Region we also finde for Sephar (remembered by Moses, Siphara by Ptoleme, standing to the East of the Mountaine Mafius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beaute and riches thereof. But this was in proceesse of time.

The other fashion of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations; contrary to reason and possibilitie. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off then in those Regions before remembered, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vied: as in Numbers 21. Balaam the King of Moab 10 hath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East, which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaam brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie;) Because they hyred Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Naharajim, to curse thee: for Aram Naharajim was Syria fluminorum, which is Mesopotamia, 20 as afore said.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seemes) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture, the Guides which I haue followed herein and which I haue chosen to goe after, making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publique, other then the discouery of truth. For as the partialitie of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hireling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vnture reports left Honor without a Monument, and Vertue without Memorie: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies 30 to those, whom the darke forgetfulness ought to haue buried, and covered ouer for euermore. And although the length and disuoluing Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I meane the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot steps of Antiquitie (as appeares by that which hath bene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-growne: for Babylon hath to this day the sound of Babel; Phoenicia hath Zidon, to which Citie the eldest Sonne of Canaan gaue name; so hath Cilicia Tharsis; and the Armenians, Medes, Hiberians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumians, Lilyans, Moors, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. I.

Of the proceeding from the first Government vnder the eldest of Families to Regall, and from regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

I followeth now to entreate how the World began to receiue Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcitie of People) vnder-went no other Dominion then Paternitie and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was alwayes vied both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Grauitie: the same bearing one signification almost in all languages. For in the cleuenth of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70. of the Elders of the people, and Gouer-

Gouernour ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly beleued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Shew it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demosthenes vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedaemonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedaemonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were, so are they called Eldermen: and againe, Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and aduisement were not in old men, our Ancesters had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernors or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernors were the Fathers of Families, and vnder them the eldest Sonnes. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in proprietic, or proper power. The kindes of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; Power or command: the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Proprietic or Mastership: the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slaue. Ad Caesarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietates; Caesar hath power ouer all; and euery man proprietic in his owne: and againe, Caesar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Caesar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seede seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, ytterly withered and fell away. And the swift weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weake, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habitually) to constrain it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided and steered by their owne fancies, and tolt to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was seuered from power, and strength from charitie: Necessitie (which bindeth euery nature but the immortall) made both the Wife & Foolish vnderstand at once; that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable then that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the mightie, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty then themselves: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall received equall harmes. In so much that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a libertie vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better tryall, no lesse perilous then an vnindurable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessitie propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracie in some degree. Vnder which Government, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, then the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection and corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessitie which inuented, and the same Reason which approped souereigne power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her owne limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, private affections in supreme Rulers made their owne fancies both their Treasurers and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings; so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: arbitria principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes then the wills of Princes: Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amor interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Love sees one while too much, another while (saith) nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few yeeres (for direction and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that government which

primum iudicium vni ex omnibus causis praeueniens

had this mixture of equalitie (holding in an even ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall: the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall: the one God established in fauour of his people: the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancie of this Regall authoritie, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Pictor) Principes, quia iustitiant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dij & dii sūt; De aureo saeculo part. 1. Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessitie; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not liue and be preserved without a Ruler and Conductor: God himselfe by his eternall providence hauing ordained Kings; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince; the Deere their Leaders; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safetie. The most high beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men; and appointeth ouer it whomsoever hee Dan. 5. 21. pleaseth. By me (saith Wisdome, spoken by the Sonne of God) Kings reigne; By me Princes Prov. 8. 15. rule, and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings, and taketh away Kings: and that this Dan. 2. 21. power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate, Thou couldest haue Iohn 19. 11. no power at all against me, except it were giuen thee from above.

It was therefore by a threecold Iustice that the world hath bene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall: by which the Parents and Elders of Families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families, in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Pietie: Again, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God: and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience: And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former: and the Obedience to this we call Dutie. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded: and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident: for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creator; as we reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had bene taught by their Parent, the Father of mankind.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites: and of the degrees of humane societie.

What other Policie was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the flood, it cannot be certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall flood: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyrannie in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, then the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who maffred (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Government of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchie: to which Tyrannie is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right and Equitie: and of this condition ought every Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Judges and Officers shall shew make thee Deut. 16. 18. in thy Cities: And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement.

The second Government is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracie, or Optimum potestas; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed: as the Decemviri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratia, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vnjust ruling of the confused multitude, scilicet diuinely swaying the State: contrary to their owne Lawes and Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholofannus, senius, paucorum, & multorum, Of one, of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policie since the second increase of Man-kinde, the same grew in this sort: First of all, every Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Houholds (man by nature louing societie) ioyned their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vici, of the Greeke μῆκος, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Via) because it hath diuers waies and paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a societie of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke παῖς, which signifieth a Fountaine: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) dranke of one Spring or Stream of water: To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnfitly.

But as men and impetie began to gather strength, and as emulation and pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from outrage, and to preserve such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioine and set together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with bankes and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab apponendo sehostibus, because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safte and defence: as also they were called Vrbes, ab urbe, because when they were to build a Citie, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Vrbs and Ciuitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Vrbs signified no other then the very wals and buildings, and Ciuitas was taken for the Citizens inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multis uis coisistit, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but only such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the Citie, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subiects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subiects are also knowne. For every Citizen is also a Subiect, but not every Subiect a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen (as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens) is no subiect, but of this we neede not it and to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken a Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μεγιστος) and so the Greekes call them Μεγιστανες, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and dutie of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith he) is the keeper of right and equitie; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finally, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth; but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for nought. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also teacheth in the same place; That euery soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any subiect therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or crueltie: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandement of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistracie. Christ commanded that all due to Cesar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremie commanded the Israelites (euē those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech; and Iacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authoritie: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) then that they should be wanting: Prestat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, then no King: to which also Tacitus subiecteth: Prestat (saith Tacitus in the first of his Historie) sub malo principe esse quam nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince then none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no libertie more safe, then to serue them: Neg enim libertas tutior ulla est (saith Claudius) quam Domino seruire bono: No libertie (saith he) more safe for vs then to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howlouer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, then vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wife man that is cruell, then vnder the foolish and barbarous crueltie of the multitude. For as Agesilaus answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would disdaine in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Houholds ioyned themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioyned together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves vnder one Gouernour, and Government, they so ioyned, were called a Commonwealt: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into several parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Contentiousness being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects whereof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then fought for no larger Territorie then themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, then sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacie of fare, or curiositie of dyer, then to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell then to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sunne.

And sure if we vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicitie of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time then to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may be doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empire, (when Princes plied their Prizes, and did then onely woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age; so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good desertings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euer Liberality ouerflow her banks & bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policie and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrinke the openet and most sensall hearts, but the experience may bringeth with it, layeth Princes torne estates before their eyes, and (wichally) perswaderh them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sunne whose meane are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeeres are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, wee praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeede) the grieuous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make the times seeme so differing and displeasing : especially the qualitie of mans nature being also such, as it adoth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust soever : Fit humana malignitatis visio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint : It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignitie, that we alwayes extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious : For it is one of the errors of wayward Age : Quod sint laudat res temporis acti : That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this aduice of Salomon : Say not then, Why is it that the former dayes were better then these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing : to which purpose Seneca, Maiores nostri quæsti sunt, & nos querimus, posteri querentur, euerfos esse mores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne nefas labi : Our Ancesters haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. These are the vsuall discourses of Age and misfortune. But heroeof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Nova res quandoq; vetus fiet, & vetus temporibus quibus capiti noua fuit & repentina: what power is new, in time shall be made old : and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontents of present times haue made Golden, this we may set downe for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crowns : so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subjects to Princes : so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subjects ; hauing respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but euen to the maner of his Creatures : Nunquam particulari bono seruit omne homin : The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend any one onely : for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike : and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs ; and by a generall loue it is, that Princes hold a generall obedience : For Potestas humana radicata in voluntatibus hominum : All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IIII.

Of the beginning of Nobilitie : and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

Verus nobilis non nascitur sed fit.

And with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authoritie began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen, vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which imployments and Offices sprung those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobilitie, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Bloud, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proued. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers : and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glory or worldly Nobilitie necessarily descended. Yet heroeof had Nobilitie denomination in the beginning. That such as excelled others in vertue : were so called : Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the deferred Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posteritie, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner : Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent : I see no other thing to be affected in Nobilitie, then that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessitie bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobilitie be Virtus & antiqua diuitia : Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobilitie, then the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vives) be a witness of vertue and well-doing : and Nobilitie (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage : then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, or in Ladie, and other Saintes : men, in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue : Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountaines, if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled : Ex terra fertilis produciunt alijunda Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra fertilis pretiosum aurum : Out of fruitful ground arise first sometimes poisoning Cicuta, and out of barren (soile) precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charron (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie : the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publike Vertue, seruing his Prince and Country, and being descended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our selues acquire by our Vertue and well deseruings) cannot be balanced with that which is both naturall by Descent, and also personall ; yet if Vertue be wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and aquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred : For (saith Charron) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or fauour : and these be indeede but Honours of affectation, which Kings with the change of their fancies will they know well how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our selues of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour, then Noblenesse, and glory to vaunt thereof. What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in shame, of a Polbare body and barren minde : for (according to the same Father) : Dele sumum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronata nitorem gloria, &c. Wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, and the glittering of the ill crowned glory, that then thou maiest consider thy selfe nakedly : for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myre, or glittering with Jewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or stuffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe ouer, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blushing because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betwene it and dust : which if thou dost not beleene (saith S. Chrysostome) looke into the Sepulchres & Monuments of thy Ancesters, and they shall easily perswade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust and dirt : so that if man seeme more Noble and beautiful then dust, this proceedeth not from the diuersitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creator.

Plutar.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life, not in the fleshy Line :
For bloud is brute, but Gentrie is Diuine.

And howsoeuer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honors be cast by birth vpon vnworthy Issues : yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehendeth the same in his Fellow-Princes : There is an euill (saith he) that I haue seene vnder the Sun, as an error that proceedeth from the face of him that ruleth : Folly is set in great excellencie.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus : and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

That Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like Soueraigne Lord : and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authoritie.

The first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Floud was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects : either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others : or else in that hee was begotten by by Chubb, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time then some of his Grand-children and Nephewes. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chubb, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Me-lanchton conceiued not amisse hereof: the same exposition being also made, by the Authour of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, A bluster or seuerer Governour, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible then Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts and <sup>10</sup> Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo inuolens est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar; so, this charge was rather giuen him, then by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrewes; nor that Sem was in this disobedient Troupe, or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphne, and Ischan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the generall opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Ur, from whence Abraham was by God called into Charran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in the vnblesseing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) <sup>30</sup> did they retain the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Illues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed; yea, it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cælestinus) lingua humane the humane tongue.

We know that Goropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius, Vergera, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolve, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Leaders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, then by violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

<sup>50</sup> BENZO, and out of him Nauclerius with others, make many Nimrods. Eusebius confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnabat post mortem patris sui Bel; qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his Father Belus, who first governed in Babylon sixty five yeeres. But it could not be vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establisher of that Empire: Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne; in the Land of Shinaar: wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather then haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authours. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat: who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words doe not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Cæsar overthrew the liberty of the Romane Commonwealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Emperour: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority ouer the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod, that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Cæsar did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned: but such agreement of times proues it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were Kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable then that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and the Townes adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Ninive.

Now whereas D. Siculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, then that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Ninive in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof turne from his obedience, whom hee recovered againe by strong hand; which was casie: Babylon being not walled till Semiramis time.

— Dicitur aliam
Coëtilibus muris cinxisse Semiramis urbem.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alledged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine hath the same of Ninus, which is one of Mercators arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue bene giuen to many other Kings as well. For if wee may beleeue Iustine, then were Pexoris King of Aegypt, and Tanis of Scythia mighty Kings before Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nimrod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betwene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue invaded & mastered those Cities so farre removed from Babel, namely, Erec, Accad, and Chalne: which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking; and consequently would haue Nimrod to haue been long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; & both those names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true. That euer Nimrod invaded any of these Cities; but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Septuagint calls Arbard, and Epiphanius, Arphal; Ninus takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for the Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Academe for Academe. Others vndervnderstand Nisibis and Ninive to be one Citie: so doe Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibis, Accad, & Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accadene to be a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arias Montanus out of S. Hierome calls Acad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibis, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the Citie of Erec, which the Septuagint call Orech; S. Angustine, Oreg, and Paginius Erec; this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Susiana; but there is also a Citie in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine proofe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third Citie (called Chalneh) some take it for Calinistis: of which Am. Marcellinus, Saint Hierome takes it for Seleucia; Herodolymianus for Cresiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agrani vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Judge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalneh, in the Land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Viterbiensis, that these foure made but one Babylon, then that they were Cities farre removed, and in seuerall Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalne from Babylon. Goe you (saith Amos) to Chalne, and from thence goe you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Geneva translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginal note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Agypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any Citie at all to be found in Agypt: Babylon of Agypt being all one with the great Citie of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Membis the ancient Citie, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalne's situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath bene formerly proued in the Chapter of Papadise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, wee may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

S. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Ninive: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built Vr for the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controuersie we wilomely disputed without any direct proofe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom, where the Scriptures are silent, the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing) the interpretation of Iunius is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confuse the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort he conuerteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erech, & Accad, & Chaluch, in terra Shinaaris; & terra hac processit in Assyriam ubi edificauit Ninium; (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Ninive. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses' time, and before it. For certainly, the other construction, (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answere the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter hee setteth downe the sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Japheth, vnto whom Sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: The sonnes of Japheth were Gomer, &c. so as Japheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, be hee eldest or youngest: because hee was first to be spoken of: with whom (hauing last named him) hee proceedes and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first, the issue of Gomer, Japheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Tanah and his sonnes: for of the rest rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numbred the sonnes of Ham, of which Chush was the eldest: and then the sons of Chush and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan, leaving Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the storie of the Hebrewes. But after hee beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had bene against order; neither would Moses haue past ouer so lightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chush, because he founded the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire: and in the eleventh Chapter he returnes to speake of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter, with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as he did in the tenth Chapter, to also in the eleventh hee maketh no report of Shem, till such time as he had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then hee beginneth with the issue of Shem, which he continueth to Abraham and Israhel. And of Iunius' opinion touching Assur, was Caluin: to which I conueniently add P. Comenius, in his historia Scholastica, gaue an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in some other sense, he vseth these words: Vel intelligendum non est de Assur filio Sem, &c. sed Assur (id est) Regnum Assyriorum inde egressum est, quod tempore Sarug proauit Abrahami factum est; (which is) Or else it is not to be vnderstood of Assur the sonne of Sem, &c. but Assur (that is, the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it: which happened in the time of Sarug the great grandfather of Abraham. After which he reconcilith the differences in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium; Respecting the beginning; but others conceiue that it had beene true from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Cedrenus, who takes Assur to be the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Viterbiensis, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornellius: who saith he tooke vpon him that name of Assur after he had beaten the Assyrians, as Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Ose 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, he makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Atentz in the yeere of Christ 854. an ancient and learned Writer, vnderstands this place with Comenius, or Commeitor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which words of Moses he giueth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, B. A. filij, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great Citie, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrary Caluin obiectioneth this place of Esay: Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; then which there is no one place in the Scriptures that hath a greater diuersitie in the translation and vnderstanding, in so much as Michaël de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluin seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Ninive: contrary to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Heromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded and ruined this Estate or Citie of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembered: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example vnto those Phoenicians, whom in this place he fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: where-by he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (in-vincible, as he himselfe thought) should also soone after be ouer-turned by the same Assyrians: as (indeede) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldaans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Genes) Assur (or the Assyrians) founded it, they carried away their strong men captiue, they vndermined their houses, and ruined their Cite. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldaorum, ex hac desolata est ab Assyrijs, quoniam murus eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceeding Verse, which all together may be thus vnderstood: If thou goe ouer to Chitim (which is Macedon or Greece) yet thou shalt haue no rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldaans; for this it made desolate by the Assyrians, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Vatablus conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chaldym, iste populus non erat illic olim; nam Assur fundauit eam nauibus, erexerunt arces illius; contriuerunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldaans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Assur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Iunius in the place of ships lets the word (pro Barbarijs) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Genes, by the Barbarians. But this is vndoubted that the Prophet Esay (as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter) did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Cilicians from Tharsis, from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Cutim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldaans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Towne of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Cite Vr or Yrchos in Chaldaa, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (euen that streame which runneth through Babylon and Otris, which now falleth into Tigris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and Rasnah) dwelling on the east bankes of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as those of Eden, Charran, and Chalde did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tigris, that is, from Teredon, and of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Yrchos: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldaes was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldaa, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now stoppt vp. Eius cursus vestitus aboleuit (saith Niger.) And Plinie: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen assum; Time hath worn away the channell of Euphrates: and the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probability) we may expound the Cite of the Chaldaes, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Cite anciently called Vr; and (by Hecateus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Yrchos: and by the Greekes, Chaldaopolis, the Cite of Chaldaa: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abraham time, inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Assur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Assur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Assur the destroyers were the Assyrians, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldaa, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Charran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Vatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued, because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Cite of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desert were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldaa is now called Archadalar, which significeth desert Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Iturians) addeth, that they are of all other people the most salvage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime barbaros.

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Iunius, nor the interpretation of Comeliter and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceived any thing that I haue read that Assur is in this place diuerly taken (as for the sonne of of Sem, when he is (spoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Assyrian Nation) yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances seeme to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Cite of the Chaldaes by Assur (into which the most of the posteritie of Sem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prove that the same Assur built Ninive, or that the same Assur was all one with Ninus; except we will make Assur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols; and the first that set vp a Statue or Image to be honored as god. Now if Assur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Sem, as he must be if he founded Ninive, then all those which seeke to giue him the honor thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if this supposed Assur whom they make the Founder of Ninive (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus; then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, and not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Cite, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsiue thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same streame that Babel and Chalne did: which worke his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Cite which she only finished: so also Ninus of Ninive: Quam quidem Babylonem posuit instaurare; She might repaire or renew Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to bee the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his flood till Alexanders time, whereupon hee wanted thus: Is not this great Babel which I haue built?

§. IIII.

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

BVt to returne to the Storie, it is plaine in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, then that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4 Cities before remembered, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Assyria, & in Assyria built foure more Cities (to wit) Ninive, Rehoboth, Celah, and Resen. And seeing that hee spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Ninive, and the other Cities of Assyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie then any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people; and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whole time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Meropes, a sermonis linguarum terrarq; distinctio; By reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Iupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after hee had reigned 114. yeeres; of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that hee spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon, and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes and ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other then of his begun enterprise against Sabathus King of Armenia, and those parts of Scythia which Berosus calls Scythia Sagra, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributarie to Ninus; that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begonne.

§. V.

§. V.

That we are not to marvaile how so many Kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanaïs of Scythia.

Hat so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soon after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Nimrod is made manifest) the causes were threefold, (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Princesse liberrall and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, then either Fortune can, or Wisdome ought; by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they eyther want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the division of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they possesse, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & vnder-tooke to inhabit all the knowne parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations: otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimrod's time, would not have beene possessed in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were; neyther did those that were sent, and travelled far off (ovder being the true parent of prosperous successe) vnder take so difficult enterprizes without a Conductor or Commander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, and of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their owne Trauailles: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against torrible violence: nor those which fought after any proportion of greatness, eyther possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vnder takings and Conquests of Nimrod (the son of Belus) made it apparent: for he found every where Kings and Monarchies, so what way soever his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vs knowne, when he first tooke on him Souer. Ignite and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia: though in his life time others also rayed themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter. Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Iustine calls Tanaïs; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had beene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reinectus all one with the great Sesostris, that liued certaine Ages after Nimrod. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names affixe vnto it.

Hence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus, question hath beene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) giuen by Nimrod, then assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrius against Julian calls the Father of Nimrod Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers haue obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue; and therefore did Nimrod and Semiramus giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sunne, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satraps: so was it vsed (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as inaffinitie) those voyces of Baal, Baalim, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belschub, and Belshephon. Those that are learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Baal by the Latine, Princeps militie, Chiefe in the Warre; though Daniel was so called (saith Suidas) Ob honorem exaltationis arcanarum rerum, in bonum of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Bel, and Baal, to haue the same signification; and sayeth, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Nimrod in memorie of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuary and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lycranus) came Idolatry, and the first vse of Images into the World. Isidore doth interpret Bel by Vexus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Affrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punicke or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God. Glycas makes it an Affrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phogor, or Peor, and called Baal) is the same which the Latines call Priapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Beel, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Belschub, the Idoll of Accaron. For Bel, or Beel foundeth (God) and Schub (Flies or Hornets;) by which name (notwithstanding) the Iewes expresse the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe, And as that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Baal, or Bahal, be iustly to be vsed towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it and forbid it. And the vsing of the word Bel among the Chaldeans for the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, tantum Solis particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belshephon, Belshephon is expounded out of Faciens, Dominus speculæ vel custodia: The Lord of the Watch-Towre, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belpheor, or Baalpheor: and Peor (they say) is as much as Denudant; and therefore the word ioyned expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vsed among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the Sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturri dictum familiarum Nobilitatem, Regum qui urbes considerant senisimi; primogeniti eorum Ioues & Iunones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimi; The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnes; their first-borne Iupiters and Iunoes; their valiant Nephewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Vives) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Nimrod, who caused his Father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Aegyptians (transported by the Dreames of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Neptune (say they) vpon Libya the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was Father to Aegyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colonie to the Riuer of Euphrates, there built a Cite, in which he ordained Priests after the Aegyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Neptune and Libya, or (with Eusebius) of Telegonus, who after the death of Apis married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athenes) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Aegyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

S for the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Indentour of Astronomie, it Plinie say true: from whence the Aegyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulcher of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the River (saith he) there are Car-Sabab Idols, where they lay the ruines of Belus his Tombe, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Bricks, a furlong high, and on many sides had a furlong in breadth. It appeares by Cyrius against Julian, that hee obtained diuine worship yett liuing.

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Atbelus) Atbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur a subditis Debatu nomen accepisse: persecutorum igitur Assyri, & finitima illi gentes: sacrificantes ei. Atbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deities (or with the name of God.) The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering Nations: have persecuted, sacrificing to him. *Euen Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thuras, who succeeded next after Ninyas, was made an Idoll-god among them, if we credit Suidas:*

After Ninus (that is, after Qingus) Thuras reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars; a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding bataille to Causas of the Rocks of Iapheth slue him. The Cassians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus saith Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soone after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship, only in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiue; and so afterward the Deuill crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deos asserunt homines fuerunt, & pro vniuersis: iustis, vita meritis vel magnificentia, colopad suos post mortem caperunt: sed & Demonibus persuadentibus) quos illo pro sua memoria honorauerunt, minores Deos existimauerunt: ad ista vero magis excolenda accesserunt Poetarum signimenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans affirmed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to bee honoured of his owne. But at length (the Devils persuading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions (concerning the honour of the dead) much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie Gentilis (saith he) inuentrix & Author in Pal. caput est imaginum, Gentilisme is the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose, Gentiles lignum adorant, tanquam imaginem Dei. The Gentiles adore wood as it were the Image of God. Ensebius also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adimantus. *Et ueretur (saith Lactantius) ne religio uana sit, si nihil uideant quod adorent; They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.*

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen (thist this ferefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian fastifie it selfe with the distinction of Doulin and Hyperdoulin, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made? And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely no where warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly and subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remove, weed it, or by feare, or by any persuasions lead the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction then these? Take therefore good heed to your selues (for ye saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selues, and make you a grauen image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likeness of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt make thee no grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, for it is written in the Booke of Wisdome, That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for euer.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature. For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil, Noli aliquid in illo formam imaginari, ne circumscribas eum mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde too. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts thoughts and mindes; how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder his greivous Peasill of a Painter, or the rustie And another Instrument of a Carpenter or Carpenters m.

For as this dishonour to the Inskild and incomprehensible God beganne in Abel, so did the Deuill transport and spread this inuention into all the Regions adioyning and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the erection of the Idols and Images, refusing to enter them in their Temples for 70. yeeres: observing the Law of Numa (who brought in impietie to resemble things most beautifull by things most base.) But Targumachus Priscus afterwards prevailing, and following the vanitie of the Gracians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of the gods; which (as Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vtrly condemned; and which Seneca thus dotheth; Simulachra deorum uenerantur, illis supplicanti, genua posita adorant, & cum hac suspiciant, subrot: quaila fecere contentum; The Images of the gods are worshipped, whose they pray vnto with bended knees, thofe they adore, and while they so greatly admire them, they contemne the Handi-craftsmen that made them: which also Seneca the Poet in this sort scoffed at:

*Heu miser qui uana colunt, qui corde inuito
Religio a sibi sculptunt simulachra summa, Faciem fugiant, & qua fecere uerentur.
Quis furor est? qua tanta animos dementia ludit?
Vt uolucrum, turpemq, boem, toruamq, Draconem,
Semi-hominemq, canem, supplex homo propius adoret.*

Ah wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) despise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie? what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens mindes: that man should vgly shapes adore,
Of Birds, or Buls, or Dragons, or the wile
Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Jewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorne the ignorant Rudidie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembreth how the Sibyls inuicighed against Images: and Hosian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Serabo and Heraclitus witness, that the Perfians did not erect or set vp any Statue of their Gods. Lycorgus neuer taught it the Lacedemonians, but thought it impietie to represent immortal natures by mortall Figures. Eusebius also witnesseth in his sixt Booke, de preparatione Euangelica, that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in Indis, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinus report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authors might bee remembered that witness the dildane which the Heathen themselves had of this childlike Idolatrie: of which Hosian hath written at large in his Tract, de origine imaginum. And it was truly sayd, Omnia mala exempla bonis imitis orta sunt, All ill examples haue sprung from good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had defered best of their Countries and Common-wealths: Effigies hominum (saith Plinie) non solabant exprimi, nisi aliqua illustri causa perpetuatum merentium: Men were not wont to make Pictures, but of men which merited for some notable cause to bee perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papists, some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra are proleptia literarum, ut per ea discerent homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they) & so before the Heathen said are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learn to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them then pictures indeed, yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memory of Belus the Babylonian, became afterward the most reuerenced Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled and cast away: so those very stocks & stones, and painted Canuaes (called the pictures of Christ, our Lorde, and others) by thousands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but esteemed to haue life, and onely understanding. On these pictures we call (saith the Booke of Idolatry) when the people through the raging waters, on these pictures more rather than the Ship that carrieth us.

This Heathen invention of Images became so fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods; that they were forced to distinguish them into degrees and orders; as Dei Consentes, seu maiorum gentium, seu felici, seu infirmi, seu medi, seu Con- sellum gods; or gods of the mightiest Nobilitie, seu felici gods; seu infirmi gods; and seu medi gods (which the Romans called Medioximii seu infirmi, and terrestrial seu medi); and multitudes of other gods: of which Saint Augustine hath made large mention in his Booke de Citate Dei. But (saith Lactantius) among all those miserable fables and vanities, worshipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimenides Cretensis by his good Angell moued I know not erect in the Athenian Fields, Altars to the unknowne God, which stood with the same title and dedication euen to the times of Socrates: who made them first know to whom these Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might discern the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obscure and stinking mist wherein the Deuill had so many yeeres led and misled them. And it sufficed not that the multitude of these gods was so great in general, or that euery Nation had some one which tooke particular and singular care of them, as Iupiter in Crete, Isis in Aegypt, in Athen Minerua, in Samos Inno, in Paphos Venus, and so of all other parts: but euery Citie, and almost euery Family had a god a-part. For as it is written in the second of Kings: 'the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cuth made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Ashima, and the Amis made Nibhaz and Tarrak, and the Sepernians burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Esay decided? Men cut downe Trees, rinde them, burne a part of them, make ready their meate, and warme themselves by the fire thereof, and of the residue he maketh a god; an Idol, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath shut their eyes from sight, and their heart from understanding: It is therefore safest for a Christian to believe the Commandments of God so direct against Idolatry, to belecue the Prophets, and to belecue S. Paul: who speake thus plainly and feelingly, Asy beloved, flye from Idolatry, as yeake as vnto them which haue understanding, iudge ye what I say.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and lastly of his Warre against Zoroaster.

NINUS this Belus succeeded Ninus, the first that commanded the exercise of Idolatry, the first that iniuriously invaded his Neighbor Princes; and the first that without shame or feare committed adulterie in publike. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) so of this Ninus (whose storie is gathered out of Prophane Authors) I finde nothing so warrantable, but that the same may be disputed, and in the greatest part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus set out and commented vpon by Amnius, hath many good things in it, and doth great light (as Chrysostom noteth) to the understanding of Dionysius Siculus, Dion, Plutarchus, and others: yet Lodouicus Pines, B. Rhenanus, and others after them haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment; prouing directly that it cannot be the same Berosus which liued in Alexanders time, cited by Athenius and Iosephus: and whose statue the Athenians erected, saith Plinius. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the succession of the Babylonian & Assyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Asadades, and to the times of Iosua. For of Metasthenes an Historian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or sothe few lines of the Chaldean and Assyrian Monarchies: but he afterwards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Ctesias of Chidus (a Citie adioyning to Halicarnassus) who liued together with Cyrus the younger, and with Artaxerxes Memnon, gathered his Historie out of the Persian Records, and reacheth as farre vppwards as Ninus and Semiramis: and though in the storie of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approbeth him in some things, and Athenius, Plutarchus and Tertullian cite him; yet so bare and apparent are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he liued, and so incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and especially of Semiramis, as whatsoever his reports were, times haue consumed his workes, sauing some very few exceptions lately published.

And therefore in things vncertaine, seeing along discourse cannot be pleasing to men of iudgement, I will passe ouer the acts of this third Assyrian, in as few words as I can expresse them. S. Angustine affirmeth that Ninus mastered all Asia, India excepted. Others say that he wanne it all, saue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conquests, with whom he entred into a straight league of amitie; because he commanded many people, and was his Kinlinan, and a Chusite, and the nereest Prince confronting Babylonia. His first enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might easily subdue, both because hee invaded it on the sodaine, and because it lay next him: and also because the Arabians and their King Aricus (which bordered Syria) assisted him in the Conquest thereof.

The King of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre against Zoroaster: for from Armenia he bent himselfe that way toward the East, but that euer he commanded the lesser Asia, I doe not beleue, for none of his Successors had any possession therein.

His third Warre was against Pharnus, King of the Medes, whome it is sayd that he ouerthrew, and cruelly murdered with his seuen Children, though others affirme that they all died in one battaile against him. Whether hee invaded Zoroaster before the building or amplifying of Niniue, or after, it is vncertaine. It is said that he made two expeditions into Bactria: and that finding little or ill successe in the first, hee returned, and set the worke of Niniue forward: and then a second time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horse, and 10000. fixe hundred Chariots; being encountered by Zoroaster with four hundred thousand. But Ninus preuailing, and Zoroaster being slaine, hee entred farther into the Countrey, and besieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrian (saith Stephanus) which by a passage found, and an assault giuen by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) hee entred and possit. Vpon this occasion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her person and external beautie, fancied her so strongly, as (neglecting all Princely respects) hee tooke her from her husband, whose eyes hee threatned to thrust out if hee refused to consent. Hee therefore yielding to the passion of loue in Ninus, and to the passion of sorrow in himselfe, by the strong persuasions of shame and dishonour, cast himselfe head-long into the water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magick: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaster King of the Bactrians, Vincenius supposeth to be Cham the sonne of Noah: A fancie of little probability. For Cham was the Paternall Ancestor of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whose sonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincenius had heard of that booke which was called Scripturae Cham, deuised by some wicked Knaue, & so intitled: of which Sextus Senensis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Cassianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the intencion of Magick to Cham the sonne of Noah: so did Comestor in his Scholasticall Historie: which Art (saith he) with the 7. liberall Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: euen of which were made of brasse, to resist the defacing by the waters of the Flood; and 7. of bricke against the iniurie of fire. There was also another deuised discourse, which went vnder the of the Deuill to doe mischief, His Maieslie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other meanes bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldaans: who took vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, and their euents: and this they vanted to perform by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vaderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magick, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfet the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they haue also to creep into the inferior degrees.

A second kinde of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, and all kindes of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Isidore goeth farther, assuming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heauenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognouit Creatorem, (saith Jo. Damascen) Who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosephus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmeticke and Astronomie, who before Abrahams coming vnto them knew none of these sciences. <sup>20</sup>

And to doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium praestantissimus Chaldaeos primus, deinde Phoenices, deinde Aegyptios sacerdotes Astrologiam & diuina docuerit; Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon asseirme, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldaans, then the Phoenicians, lastly, the Egyptians trifles, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kinde of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature; not the babblings of the Aristoteleans, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virtutes in centro centri latentes; Petrus hideth in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort <sup>30</sup> were Aristus, Arnoldus de Villanova, Raymond, Racon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vaderstood the power of Nature, and how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyranus remembered by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Italians, Thessian; among the Egyptians, Hermes; among the Babylonians, Bu Bala; the Thracians had Zamolxis; the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris; and the Italians, Petrus Aponeusis. The Magick which these men profest is thus defined: Magia est conuersio à viro sapiente agentium per naturam compatiens sibi congruenter respondebantibus, vt inde opera prodeant non sine eorum admiratione qui causam ignorant; Magick is the connexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a <sup>40</sup> wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kindes which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confesseth God to be the Creator of the Vniuersall: he beleueneth of the Trinitie, which he could not inueigilate by any naturall knowledge: he spakeeth of Angels, and of Paradise: approacheth the immortality of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: which Oracles of his, Isidorus, Petrus, Patricius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phenicians, vsing Zoroaster owne words: Hic ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilis sempiternus, ingenitus, expert partium, sibysse similitudo, bonorum omnium auctus, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacre nature vniuersus inventor, &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, everlasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learn'd iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inuener thereof.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldaans, doth distinguish those wise men men into five orders, (to wit) Chasædum, or Chaldaans: Aphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Arioli, or Sapibits) Metachaphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Possioners; and Gazarim Augures, or Auspices, or Diuiners.

Chasædum were those which had the name of Chaldaans, which were Abrommers: Hic ceterum motus diligentissime spectantibus; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Aphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Qui de omnium tam diuinorum quam humanarum rerum causis philosophantur; who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the sonne of Beor) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the inuention of this arte to Zoroaster the Persian. <sup>Laert. l. 1.</sup>

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroaster: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which hee receiued from his Ancesters.

Metachaphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those of which we haue spoken already out of His Maiesties booke of Demonologie.

Gazarim, or Auspices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beastes flaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction wee may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the Kings of Babylon enterteyned; and that the name and profission of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truly obserueth, Præteriti religionis Persica, ut in populo Dei Leuitæ, iudicij, vera Philosophia deitatis erant: nec quisquam Rex Persarum poterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamque percepisset; The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were given to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. <sup>Peucer, de Diuinitat. in code imp. fol. 135. 136.</sup>

Sixtus Senensis in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kindes of Magick, his owne words are these: Et ne quem moueat præuulgus Polychronij & Theophili testimo- <sup>Abd. l. 6. fol. 44.</sup> nia, cicindulum est adplicem esse Magiam; alteram vbiq; ab Origine damnatam, quæ per fæ-

dera cum demonibus iuta aut verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, quæ ad præctice naturalis philosophia pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; I hat the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be vaderstood that Magick is of two sorts, the one euery where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seeminglie) by couenants made with Deuils; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practice part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally.

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries vppon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these foure kindes of wise Men formerly remembered, hee vseth this distinction: Quos nos harios, cateruimus (i. e. idest) incantatores interpretati sunt; videntur mihi esse qui verbis semper agunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur; malefici, qui sanguine videntur & victimis, & sapienterunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldais Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Consectudo autem communis Magos pro malefici accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldaeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quoque & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in instituta Dominij Saluatoris ipse primus mortuorum eius intellexerunt; & venientes sanctam Bethlehem adorauerunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente. They whom wee call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seeme to mee such as performe things by wordes; Magicians, such as handle euery thing philosophically; Witches, that vse blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldaans I take them to bee signified by the name of Coniecturers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their owne Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldaans: yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the nativite of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and coming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the Starre from above shewing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference betwene the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex facere falso visum diabolici opera ad rem quancumq; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Diuell, useth his helpe to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Diuorce) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature; other Arts which vndergoe that title, were invented by the fallhood, subtilty, & enuy of the Diuell. In the latter there is no other doctrine, then the vse of certaine ceremonies, Per mala fidem; By an euill faith: in the former no other ill, then the inuestigation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitlie to apply things that worke, to things that suffer. And though by the Jewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, & Diuines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mechaschephim, or Mecaphim; yet had they no other reason then common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficiis accipit; Common custome saith

S. Hierome in Dauid. Hieron. in Dauid. Mel. Ister Martyr by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur expauit thou

Mar. Titi. par. prim. fol. 173. *Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Evangelio gratiosum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem Jonas & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ecceimus) why dost thou* to vse the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a witch or Coniurer, but a wife man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that studie & profession, but only idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? Causa fuit mirificientia quorundam operum, quae vera opera naturalia sunt: veruntamen quia procuratio demonum naturae ipsas vel coniungentium, vel commiscientium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus haec. De operibus humanis (modi est) Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprè vocant: The marvelousse of some workes, which (indeed) are naturall, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these workes haue bene done by procurement of Devils, ioyning the naturae together or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the naturae to their working, they were thought the workes of the Devils by the ignorant. Among these workes is naturall Magick, which men call very improperly Necromantie.

Cul. Paris. de leg. 4. cap. 14.

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith hee) the vtermost actiuite of naturall agents we are afisled to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for other wise (to vse his owne words) ignoratis terminis potentiae & virtutis rerum naturalium *Ita ut nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quae fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia; The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether those verie workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall means: after which hee goeth on in this sort: Ideo non hereticè, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per talem Magiam adiunari nos in cognoscenda diuinitate Christi: Therefore I said not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by such Magick we are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Jewes and others the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously object, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not about Nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his yeeres fuller of knowledge then any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason auow, that the vtermost of Nature's workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme and diuine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.*

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Diuell here, as in other kindes hath sought to obtrude euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

Being therfore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other then, Diuinorum cultor & interpret: A studious observer & expounder of diuine things; and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of naturall Magick) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophia absoluta consummatio. Thence the absolute perfection of natural Philosophie: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way sorteth with wife and learned men, promiscue and without difference & distinction, to confound lawfull & praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vse S. Paul's words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Diuell hath thrust in, and by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Diuell (who knoweth more then any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, and Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemne the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Diuell also in the Oracles of Amphiarauus, Amphilocheus, Trophonius, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Diuell from the beginning hath sought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the Ministers and Seruants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angell of Light. Hee hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; hee hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Stars, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting obserueth) it is true, that iudiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art; considering that heavenly bodies (as euen generall experience sheweth) haue and exercise their operation vpon the inferior. For the Sunne, and the Starre of Mars doe drie; the Moone doth moisten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they haue seuerall and proper names, so haue they seuerall and proper vertues: the Starres doe also differ in beaurie and in magnitude; and to all the Starres hath God giuen also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Starres, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Diuell ceaselesse not to thrust in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, and Incantations; and taught men to beleue in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his owne with the All-powerfull Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was neuer ignorant, that both the wife and the simple obserue when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and flye into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth; that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken fire weather; that the crying of Crows and barbing of Ducks foretew raine: for they feeble the Ayre moistened in their Quills. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Starre in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemy of Mankind, working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to obserue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the Warre: and (withall) to looke into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnsearchable prouidence in the Livers and bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames, not only to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Almelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because hee admonished Ioseph, and by Dreame informed Iacob, Laban, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Job: In Dreames and Visions of the night when sleepe falleth vpon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to returne from his enterprise: therefore, I say, doth the Diuell also practise his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Paristenis) diuinitatis imitations, his mocke-diuitie. This in the end grew to common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yea the Romanes finding the inconuenience hereof, because all dreames (without distinction of causes) were drawne to Diuination, forbad the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandis somnijs occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be condemned, not that Marcus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dreame for two grievous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Psolomies poisoned wound; nor that which Saint Angustine reporteth of a Millaneses, whose sonne (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dreame where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor every day, that the Diuell leaues all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallowes, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegassus, to conueigh them in haste to places farre distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (saith Saint Paul) God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transportations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Maiestie in the second Booke and the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confuted by vnanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses and Crystals: of whom Cusinus: Fatus sunt incantatores, qui in uergis & vitro uolunt spiritum includere: quia Spiritus non clauduntur corpore: They are foolish Inchanters which will shut up their Spirits within their nates or in Glasse: for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Thourgia, or white Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Invocation they draw out of Heauen, and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creator: so seeing they are most free Spirits; that they can be constrained or commanded out of haue corrupted the vnderstanding; that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting and abstinence in general; yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or enforcement, are men of euill faith and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Diuels which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire called Pyromantia; by water, called Hydromantia; by the ayre, called Atmocochinia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Falcination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse cruell and cruell, reuengefull and bloody, then the Diuell himselfe. And these accursed creatures hauing sold their soules to the Diuell, worke two wayes; either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and Witches, His Maiestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Diuell.

There is another kind of pettie Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighting on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falcination, and these accursed creatures hauing sold their soules to the Diuell, worke two wayes; either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and Witches, His Maiestie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) command; the other obey the Diuell.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Incantments (which the Marjians a people of Italie practised: Colubros disrumpit Marjia cantu: Inchanting Marjia makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath bene vsid it appears, Psalm 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde, and euen by naturall causes may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layd in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I finde no other Magicke or Incantment, then to draw out a Moufe with a peece of tosted Cheefe.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Diuell seemeth to worke his wonders.

Vnto the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Diuell any other dominion then hee hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance, as when Aegypt, according to Dauid, was destroyed by euill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their owne reason disswading them from daring overmuch, or indeede (and that which is the onely certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens eos ligatos (saith the same Author) velut immani simas bel-luar. Saint Augustine was of opinion that the Frogges which Pharaos Sorcerers produced were not naturall, but that the Diuell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) madethem appeare to be such. For as Petrus obserueth, those Frogges of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, which might argue that they were not creatures indeede. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Nec sane Demones naturas creant, sed quia Deus creat a sunt commutant, ut uideantur esse quod non sunt: The Diuels create not any natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason. Damon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes mentes intelligentias per quas aperire lumen rationis radius mentis solet, (that is) The Diuell fills with certaine clouds all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertullian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiveth, if the Diuell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blinde them, it is not hard for him to dazzle those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth into the Diuell enteth in, beginning with the fantastic, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantastic is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Frogges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magicæ artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Augustine in another case like vnto this (to wit) of the turning of Diomedes his Companions into Birds, per alia cum passiuis, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perswaded that Saint Augustine beleue that of Diomedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned also confirmeth. For speaking of naturall Atrocitatem he veth these words: De his modi autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutorij, que ipsa semina nature confortant & acunt, ita ut opus generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus natura uideatur (que tardius talia efficere consuevit) sed potentia Demonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his docti sunt talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such workes (saith he) the sodaine generation of Frogges and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh; but by meanes strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them; in such wise that they so basiten the worke of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the worke of Nature, which usually worketh more leisurely, but they thinke it is done by the powers of Diuels. But they who are learned in these Arts maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Diuels doe most frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the vertu-mof nature; and by illusion: for there is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God onely.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests; and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compresse it; who knows not that these things are all of naturall? Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that hee sometimes doth it: but how? In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: and he fore-told the death of Saul, at such time as he was in his owne possession and power to dispose of. And heretofore hath liued from the infancy of the world to this day, and obserued the successe of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations: he that is of counsaile with all those that studie and practise subuersion and destruction: hee that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, then those that inhabit the earth: if he should not sometimes, yea if hee should not very oftentimes guffe rightly of things to come (where God please to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wife and learned men do sometimes in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth : and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beaurie and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus : and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

His he did after the death of her husband Ninus : who after he had mastered Babylonia, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the worke of Ninus, he left the World in the yeere thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeeres, Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he would grant vnto her the absolute soueraine power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenians, and others, speaks of five dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) she caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, then that it had any truth.

How soeuer Ninus came to his end, Semiramis tooke on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because hee changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea to Ninive in Assyria. Iustin reports, that Semiramis (the better to invest her selfe, and in her beginning without murmure or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her sonne Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorabile acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vnder-taken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninus had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (who was very personable) could be taken for him; yet it is very vnlike that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeeres after by any such subtiltie: (for so long shee reigned after the death of her husband;) but it may be true that Ninus or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous gouernment and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

SOME Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue been of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Countie, a Syrian. Berosus calls her after the name of her Citie wherein she was borne, Semiramis Ascaloni; or Ascalon, the ancient Citie and Metropolis of the Philistims. Others report her to be the daughter of Derectus, a Curtian of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derectus or Derectus, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had profest a holy and a religious life, to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the banke of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly yong man, she was by him made with childe, which (for feare of extreame punishment) she conuayed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the banks of the Lake: in which (while the childe was left to the mercy of wilde beasts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which vsed to feede vpon or neere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this childe, who being perchance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her dishonor and breach of vow, notwithstanding which she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, and (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beaurie & humane shape. It is thought that from this Derectus the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistims (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body: into into whose Temple when the Arke of God was brought, the Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so S. Hierome hath conuerted that place, Palatium, Paganius, and Iunius, write it by Dagon onely, which signifieth a fish, and so it onely appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being sundred from the body.

For my selfe I rather thinke, that this Dagon of the Philistims was an Idoll representing Triton, one of those imaginarie Sea-gods vnder Neptune. For this Citie being maritime: (as all those of the Philistims were, and so were the best of Phenicia) vsed all their deuotion to Neptune, and the rest of the pettie gods which attended him.

§. IIII.

Of her Expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbabilitie of her vices.

IFt for her Pedegree, I leaue it to the Assyrian Heralds: and for her vicious life, I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Grecians. For delicacie and ease doe more often accompany licentiousnesse in men and women, then labour and hazard doe. And if the one halfe be true which is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princess more worthy of fame then Semiramis was, both for the workes shee did at Babylon and elsewhere, and for the warres shee made with glorious successe: all but her last enterprize of India; from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that shee neuer returned: and that of all her most powerfull Armie there suruiued but onely twentie persons: the rest being either drowned in the River of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurobates. But as the multitude which went out are more then reason hath numbered: so were those that returned lesse then could haue escaped of such an Armie, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which shee leuied by her Lieutenant Derectus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hooks on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which fought vpon Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vses three hundred thousand; of Gallies with brazen heads three thousand, by which shee might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, which no one place of the earth was able to nourish (had euery man and beast but fed vpon grass) are taken from the authority of Ctesias whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Armie (though the same was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerlode the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Armie of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Armie of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staurobates vpon the banks of Indus, canticum cantant extremum: shee sang her last song; and (as Antiquitie hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Doue (the bird of Venus) whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Doue in their ensignes.

§. V.

Of the Temple of Belus built by Semiramis: and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

AMONG all her other memorabile and more then magnificent workes (besides the wall of the Citie of Babylon) was the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this Citie, inclosed with a wall carryed fouresquare of great height and beaurie, hauing on each square certaine Brazen Gates curiously engraued. In the Core of the square there raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (making a Basis of a lesse circuit) three ft a second Towre; and so eight in all, one above another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests fortieth three yeere of Ninus was the birth yeere of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeere after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling betweene those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeeres; others 352. yeeres betweene Abraham's birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archilochus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annius) makes but 250. yeeres from the flood to Ninus: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeere of Ninus, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeere of Abraham's birth was in the yeere after the flood 293, or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeere 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolued question and Labyrinth of time, it behoueth me to giue reason for my owne opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walke aside, and in a way apart from the multitude; yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at nouelty, than to goe on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuerity.

§. II.

Apapofall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Flood, and not in the yeere 352.

Hose which seek to proue this account of 292. yeeres, betweene the general flood and Abraham's birth, ground themselves first on these words of the Scriptures: So Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beda, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrews before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lye, that Terah at 70. yeeres begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the sonne of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeere of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then be proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeere of Terah's age, then in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeere, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. yeeres: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeeres.

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and it, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines long since, and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now for as much as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abraham's journey into Canaan be first considered of; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method so farre, as to search in to a strange tradition concerning his nauiailes, that serueth as a ground for this opinion, and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceiued that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan: the latter after his Fathers Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling, which he performed without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a conceit, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebrewes, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when hee was called) obeyed God, so hee went out into a place which he should afterwards receive for inheritance: and hee went out, not knowing whether he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serueth very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of S. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell. Against which place so direct, & plaine, what force hath any mans fancie or supposition, perswading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can picke any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleeued in the rest. But that he performed the commandment of God after his Fathers death, leaving Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abraham's coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes his aduersaries too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, and the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despair, he had more cause then euer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborn nations: a Nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. He was besieged with famine at his first arrival, and driuen to flee into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was olde, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himselfe for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles: and through Countries of which he had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great river of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Desarts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermion or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disproue this fancie; the manner of Abraham's departing from Haran hath more prooffe, that hee had not animus reuertendi, not any thought of looking backward, than any mans bare conceit, be hee of what antiquity or authority soeuer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan, & to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him, his wife, and kinsmen, and his and their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warme, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if he could haue bene thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arrival. For had his Father bene then alieue, he might haue hoped from him to receive, more assured comfort and reliefe, then among the Egyptians, to whom he was a meer stranger both in Religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abraham's returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the

the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not ouer-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeeres olde, or a little more. How then did it happen, that hee likt quite vndone the businesse, which was weade, was within foure or fve yeeres after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not hee binde with a verie solemn oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither hee nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia,<sup>10</sup> that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had bene there in person so latelie, as within foure or fve yeeres before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his own iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely sonne, who was then fve and thirtie yeeres old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the flood had begotten children: rather than haue left all at randome to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor was knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleued, that either Abraham forgot his businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuile. What might bethe reason, that Abraham man, in doing his Masters errand, was faine to lay open the whole story of his matters prosperitie, telling it as to newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham him selfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately bene among them, would not all this haue bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to haue returned backe to Haran, would perhaps be a question hardlie answerable: considering how averse hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kinred could not haue bene obtained without his personall presence. Isaac indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a Wife of his owne linage; not without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that iourney: yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many injuries; and finally was driuen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence written, yet out of all written examples it may be obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That briefe saying, Remember Lots Wife, contains much matter. Let vs but consider Mesopotamia from whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole nation of the Israelites was deliuered: we shall finde, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posteritie of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that he conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a peece of his prosperitie; but the propheticie which thereupon hee heard by Esaie, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when<sup>40</sup> by the waters of Babylon they fate downe and wept. Concerning Egypt we read, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamitie vpon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours was the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Deuteronomy, that God had said, They should no more returne thy way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horses. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things doe argue it probably: that he neuer returned, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination: and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children; than that they can perswade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, which they in many one Scripture to prooulet it, I will beleue as they doe. For all the traualles of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Chaldees to Haran or Charran; and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem he he removed to a mountaine betwene Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt, from Egypt he returned thither againe, where Lot and he parted, because their flocks and herds of Cattle were more; thence could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre, neere Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, vnder Abimelech: and after heere vnto it at Bersabee, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriab. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charran, appeareth not in anie one storie, either diuine or humane. Now if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath fained, it should in reason bee therewithall beleued, that hee would in those his first traualles haue provided himselfe of some certaine seate, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, with his wife, kinsmen, familie, goods and Cattle, not knowing whereon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when he came from Charran, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plain of Moriab: where finding no place to inhabit, hee departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and finde out some fit habitation: from whence againe, as it is written in Genesis the eleuenth, Hee went forth, going and iourneying towards the South: and alwaies vnsettled. By occasion of which wandring to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebraei.

Further, to prooue that hee had not formerly bene in the Countrey, wee may note, that ere he came vnto Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seede will I give this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him vnknowne. For Abraham without anie other provident care for himselfe, beleued in the Word of the liuing God: not either sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being arrived, hee receiued a second promise from God, that he would giue those Countreies vnto him and his seede to inhabit and inherite.

Lastly, what should mooue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted anie such double iourney of Abraham, seeing hee set forth downe all his passages else where, long and short: as when hee moued from Sichem, and parted betwene Hai and Bethel: the distance being but 20. miles: and when hee moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles: and when he left Mamre, and fate downe at Gerar, being lesse then five miles; No, Moses past over all the times of the first age with the greater breuicie, to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shunting vp all betwene the Creation & the Flood in five chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeeres: but he bestowed on the story of Abraham fourteen chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the fve and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeeres. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning *Abraham*s trauels, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remoues of five miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and coming would haue misfit some varietie of matter, or accident, worthe the inserting and adding to *Abraham*s storie.

6. IIII.

The answer to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirty yeere.

Now touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeere, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to haue a sonne at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeed mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeeres. For when the Angell said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre, Loe, Sarah thy wife shall haue a sonne, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were olde and stricken in age, and it ceased to bee with Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then, in that it is said, it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was wrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Reurab had many sonnes after *Sarah*s death, as Zimron, Isackhan, Medan, Adidiam, Isbak, and Shual: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeeres after Isaac: the youngest yongest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres olde should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despai of Abraham at one hundred yeeres? For Sarah died in the yeere of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the yeere 2109: and Abraham did not marry Keturah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109. out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begat 5. sons 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Nooh, Obed, and Jesse, who lived so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begat sonnes at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be maiuiled at, that Terah begat Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and feuen yeeres after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the obiections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

If followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age together in doubt, except we allow him to be the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made uncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any pericll rule or knowledg.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnkil we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the yeere of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, that Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205; so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect unto Nahor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham onely, with whom God established the Covenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nahor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not wimited by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, were they Idolaters or other wife. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Isaac: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great-grand-mother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a son at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not haue conceiued. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nahor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nahor: It was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is Ios. 24. 2. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleued and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and Citie of Ur in Chaldaea, as Abraham did, and removed thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, as they left Chaldaea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Haran, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Jacob, his owne kins-men: he himselfe having also married in his owne familie; not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleued in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Well beside Charran, he invited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said: This thing is proceeded of Iehouah: meaning that it was the will of the true God it should be so; whom he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written: Take, goe that she may be thy Masters sons wife, even as Iehouah hath said. This their often vling

Gen. 24. 7. §. 1. ner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c.

Gen. 24. 7. §. 2. an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said: This thing is of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some latter writers, as Caictan, Olesiter, Masculus, Caluin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because he retained certaine Idols, or household Gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleued in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of I E H O V A H, as aforesaid. So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who, Iure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that Abraham was not the eldest sonne of Terah.

The maine obiection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the times, endeavour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture, And Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooffe at all that he was the eldest and first borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Iuda and Ioseph of Jacob: nor Dauid the eldest of Jesse; nor Salomon of Dauid: as is formerly remembered.

But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age he began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo natiuitatis, sed significatio future dignitatis: in qua excelluit Abraham. The order of natiuitatis is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignitie: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here, where it is said, that Terah lived 70. yeeres, and begat Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget sonnes, him selfe being begotten by his Father Nachor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begat Seth at 130; Enos at Kenan at 90; Kenan at Mahalaleel at 70; Mahalaleel lived at 60: Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as aforesaid. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the yongest of Terahs sonnes, then otherwise: though for his excellencie he was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Eieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentie, quia in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellencie, for which in Scripture he is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spiritual blessing, for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest and first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vniuersi potius electio diuina, quae commitem secum trahit pietatem, & Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noa, & Abrahamo in liberis Thare. Pietie, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it, pietie and the feare of God, gaue place and precedencie to Semo among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entered Canaan in the 75. yere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Isaac, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. It was Gen. 12. 4. at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he refused Lot and overthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it, Nor fauour this largen- count of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers haue approued it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testi- monies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparent to all men of iudgement, that the best approued Historians, Diuine and prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, and forpast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudge- ment to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeeres, or thereabouts, betweene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeeres betweene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to bee the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeere of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeeres. And if we looke ouer all, and doe not haRilly fastie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiated doe sloth- fully and drowily sit downe; we shall finde it more agreeable rather to allow the reckon- ing of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it about 1072. yeeres betweene the Flood and Abraham's birth: then to take away any part of those 352. yeeres giuen. For if we aduicely consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abraham's time, yea before Abraham was borne, wee shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times over- deeply betweene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleede thereby, were not the testi- monie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine, That wherefoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may bee conceiued disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of in- terpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abraham's time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Agypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and, and all the bordering Countries: yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with stickes, but of hewen stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, then those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest, and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailes? gi- uing alio strength thereby to common cauillers, and to those mens apillsh braines, who only bend their wits to finde impossibilities, and monsters in the storie of the World and Mankinde.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Affryans, and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

Annals 2087
dit. 312. m. 100
Abraham 100
Ang. de Gen. 10
Dei. 1. 10. c. 12

IN this sort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the generall Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeeres were consumed: and ta- king the Affryan History with vs, the same number of yeeres were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeere of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeeres, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeeres to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg Regu at 30. Regu Seug at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabia, Raama and Sabecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approueth. Giuing then 30. yeeres more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeeres to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeeres were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes

were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparifon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Regu in the same yeere of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generati- ons to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for sure wee are that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they ar- rived in Shinar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) we may giue them for their tra- uels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and as some ancient writers haue conceiued, and hecimus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaines sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Helus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approueth: which two num- bers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Flood to Abraham's birth: which number of 114. needesse bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be objected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare o- uer-short. For Nimrod, by this, accompted in all but one hundred twenty nine yeeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Ar- phaxad the sonne of Sem, liued four hundred three yeeres: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne, Ninus reigned 9. yeeres: which added to 43. make 52. Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his Successor. Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Affrya 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere complet of Abraham's life.

Ninus or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the second yeere of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia. When Abraham was 85. yeeres olde, hee rescued his nephew Lot, and overthrew by surprise Amraphel King of Shinar, or Babylonia. Ninus reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue bene this Ninus, the sonne of Ninus, and Semi- ramis, whose 23. yeere as aforesaid, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, and the 33. yeere of his owne reigne: after which he reigned five yeeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninus, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Affryan Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue set them downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine; vnlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impietie: or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condemne all ancient Historians for fables.

§. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham overthrew: Gen. 14. may proba- bly be thought to haue bene Ninus the sonne of Ninus.

NOW touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abraham's life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the reigne of Ninus, Ninus Zameis the king of the Affryans, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to asseme what he was, and how he could be at this time King of Babylonia: Ninus Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninus or Zameis, was no other then our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Babylon, and overthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the Successor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abraham's life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and overthrew the rest. True it is, that

Gen. 14. 4.

this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chief, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is written, *Twelve yeeres were they subiect to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprise, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tigris, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel bene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, he should not haue needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those four Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodome, Gomora, &c. were his vassals, and not Amraphels;) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall flow more plainly in that which followeth) receiued a downe right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betwene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.*

§. X.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof hee is said to haue bene King, lies betwene Coele Syria and Arabia Petraea.

NOW the two other kings ioyned with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal: the one king of Ellas, the other of the Nations. For Ellas, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should bee Hellepont: which opinion Peregrinus fauoureth. But this is onely to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petraea, or into Idumaea, which Countreies these foure King chieflly inuaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vnder all the Art they had to inuite Craus to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could bee more dangerous for himselfe, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examine the enterprise what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodome, Bishia King of Gomorra, Shinab King of Admah, and Shemebar King of Zeboim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning, of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all slaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countreies, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, bee imagined to haue bene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakenesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alledged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cesar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie Kings, or of the other Countreies: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cesar, and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtfull then fearefull: But the whole Countrey by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountainer of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the South side, and by Lybannus on the North, consisting of the two final Prouinces of Trachonitis or Basjan, and the Region of the Moabites: a conquest farre vnualueable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Ellas for Pontus: so Symonichus makes Arioch a King of the Seythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyn with the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Ellas at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat, on the mountaines whereof the Atke did rest, so doe they in this place retain the Hebrew word Ellas, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Peregrinus himselfe remembereth other opinions farre more probable then this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latine Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Vrbibus a Græcian Cosmographer, findeth the City of Ellas in the border of Cælesyria: and S. Hierome callth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cælesyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was King: who formerly ioyned with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same famili; and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arus was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Machabees: the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that wee finde in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Seythia: regions farre removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Jadith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria; according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betwene the Sea-coast, and Mædia: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (knowne by the name of Arus, Arioch, Aretas, or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Province call'd Elymas (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Jadith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch here spoken of may with more reason be taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arus, the confederate of Ninus: whose sonnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all from that side towards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

HE fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Goyim, which Strabon takes to be a proper name: Lyræ of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation: Peregrinus out of Strabo, findes that Galilee was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant: Such are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilee was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanites were then in the Land, howsoeuer they might be afterwards mixt; which I know not, But there are many pettie kingdoms adioyning to Phœnicia, and Palestina; as Palmyrena, Batanea, Laodicea, Apamena, Chalcedice, Castrois, Chalibemiss, and all these doe also ioyn themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together vnder Tidal, I take to be the probablest coniecture.

§. XII.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the chiefe of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impayred.

WHATLY, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall gouernour of Babylon, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Paterius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euermore called by the name of Chaldaea, Shinar, Babylon, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Kedarlaomer was so called of Kider, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew signifieth Regale: for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion, and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, doe not long last: Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a time of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selfe had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire did at once with himselfe: all whose chiefe Commanders became kings after him. Tamerlain conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preuent furie God hath adioyned a short life: and whatsoeuer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, inuaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruell. Semiramis taking the opportunitie, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, then her Paramour: enlarged the Babylonian Empire, and beautified many places therein with buildings vnexempld. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feminine then she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, and reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning (whose subiection, and calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successe. For in regno Babylonic Incipit resplenduit, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninus) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the necks of mortall men hauing beene neuer before galled with the yoke of forsaie dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most misentle and detested condition of liuing in slaue: no long descent hauing as yet inuaded the Assyrian with right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idleness, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeeres, and thereof the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnessed thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, and bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indououred to gaine what he could not governe, nor to keepe what he could not without contentions perill enjoy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferior to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal; make it seem probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, and restrained againe to Babylon.

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great traualle vpon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldaea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yere of Ninus, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, tooke this great iourney in hand: in which time of 23. yeeres after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recouered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Armeie of foure millions, with her selfe utterly consumed in India, and all her armies and engines of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest foules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, inuaded the Bactrians and Caspians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not beene revolted from Ninias, after Ninus death. And as Arius recouered one part, so did Balens or Balanens, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest revolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Aegypt to India: and therefore was called Xerxes Idest, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vnder takings had bene no other then the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninus and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninus and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bene gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

§. XIII.

That it is not vnprobable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusal, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intitled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the Historie must be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often elsewhere in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if (as Hierome hath it) Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may wee otherwise conceiue this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue bene vnwilling to finde, because they could not finde how to resolve them. For as it had bene a strange coniecture to thinke that Arius was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites, as far as from Pontus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bene once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldaea, Mesopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Townes, whose very names how they should come to his eare, being disioyned by so many great Nations of different languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Elasar, and that of Tidal, so far off remoued, were become his dependants; what reason can wee finde that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodom and Gomorah? and when he should haue sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, and those other Kings, against five petty Townes, leauing Tyrus and Sidon: & the great Citie of Damascus, with many other places of much importance, and farre neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be alledged against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehement: so are the objections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had beene revolted, as forcible; yea and more; as being grounded partly vpon the text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Princes to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, then that he should come or send to reclaim them: was it not more then madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute and therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betwene Euphrates, yea betwene themselves and the river of Indus?

Indus : Likewise on the part of Chedorloamer we should finde no great wisdom, if he knowing the weaknesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenant, with small forces he might have subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Countie, was not sufficient to counteruaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small did it must his valour haue bene, who with so mighty preparations effected no more then the wasting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them; but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countie, although he had broken their armie in the field? Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed to be great) make any fearefull matter: but compose the two armies as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against five: 10 yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall finde that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Nimias, who lived foure or five yeeres longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Historie haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the name of Lords and Commanders every one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colony, seeking place where to settle himselfe and them, as was the usual manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorloamer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might consort together, and make the weakest of the Countie which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations; in the infancy of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens invading Africa and Spain, with almost as many kings as feuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. This Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Nimias then reigning in Assyria: whose vnnimlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vnder-taking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed, in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seek adventures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselves, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streame of wagers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Nimias: and that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferior to the Persian Chedorloamer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may lay that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Satrap of Shinar, vnder Nimias: who may be supposed to haue had, his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Cite Ninive: and to haue preferred it before Shinar and Babylon the Cities of his Mother, whom he hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, and wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, that these foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countie named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countie themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hence to adde, that Chedorloamer seemes rather called a Persian king, then King of Persia: and that Arach (whose kingdom vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) having bene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captiues of Persian Kings. (These and such like things here to vnderstand, with circumstances to adorne a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is unworthy to haue so long a stay on it: especially considering, that it is not my intention to employ any more time in making it good, but to leave it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of the opinions, or any other, if he finde any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countie or people foure these foure were Kings, this expedition is the only publication that we

we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esa and Jacob, as they are registered by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand vpon things generally knowne to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath bene elsewhere already spoken, nor to preuent our selues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, we passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Aegypt: by which it appears that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a seled and flourishing kingdom, it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities, and first kings thereof.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Aegypt from the first peopling of it after the • Flood, to the time of the deliuerie of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A brieue of the names and times of the first Kings of Aegypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points.

One after the confusion at Babel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse knowne the fertilitye of Aegypt before the Flood) camethither and tooke possession of the Countie; in which they built many Cities: and beganne the kingdom one hundred ninie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouvernours of this Kingdom till such time as Israel departed Aegypt, are shewne in the Table following.

An. Mundi.	An. dil.
1847.	191.	Cham.
2008.	352.	Osiris.
2269.	613.	Typhon.
		Hercules.
2276.	620.	Orus.
2391.	735.	Sesostris the great.
2424.	768.	Sesostris the blinde.
2438.	782.	Bustris or Orus the second.
2476.	820.	Acencher or Thermutis or Meris.
2488.	832.	Rathoris or Athoris.
2497.	841.	Chencres drowned in the red Sea.

The Table and especially the Chronologie is to be confirmed by probabilities and coniectures, because in such obscuritie, manifest and restlesse truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Aegyptian Kings: which he would not haue done, if they had not bene more vncertaine then the Sicyonian, whom he remembreth, then whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscuritie in the Aegyptian Storie, was the ambition of the Priests: who to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leasings, and recounted vnto strangers, the names of many Kings that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is that the magnificent works and royall buildings in Agypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesseth that their Princes were of marvellous greatnesse: and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Agyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Agyptians, and publishing in their owne name, such as pleased them best, haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs, by their authority. A third and general cause of more than Agyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (if to the censures of sundry very learned, I may add mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing seene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what he would, may be credited, as to an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it commeth to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Agyptian Kings, runs thrice altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. II.

That by the account of the Agyptian Dynasties, and otherwise it appears that Chams reigne in Agypt began in the yeere after the Flood, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authoritie of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether with the Histories of the Assyrians, Troians, Italians, and others, &c. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Nimrod: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each 43. yeere of Nimrod: vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all of the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynasty endured fourteene yeeres: the fourteenth 26. the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to haue bene vnder the three yonger Gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I doe not therefore beleuee that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath bene mentioned, because Anniius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot rectifie the account vpon this onely reason, that Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as current, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast; by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the sixteene former, being subducted out of the sum of 352. yeeres, which were betwene the Flood and Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynasty, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Agypt, was in the yeere 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankinde which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Annus diluui 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Giles recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wives, Children, Cattell, and substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seuentie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Agypt, we allow twenty yeeres: and these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Agypt, and settling there, make vpon the summe of 191. yeeres; at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Agypt, in the beginning of the first Dynasty. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we add the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth, which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue bene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their seuerall times times about 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Agypt haue bene peopled as soone as Babel after the Flood: or the Dynasties (as Mercator thinkes) must haue bene before the Flood. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Agypt, after the Flood, enough hath bene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the Flood, the number of the long-lived generations betwene Adam and the Flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue bene as well after the Flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Policie, as had to bene vied in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authority and power of the Conducter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, of times many vnder one King.

HE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not seuerall rayces of Kings, as the vaunting Agyptians were wont to stile them. What they were, it were not certainly to be warranted. For in restitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooff, That it was the manner of the Agyptian Kings, to put the government of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, onely reseruing the Soueraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, and more then one vnder Osiris or Mizraim; and must therefore haue bene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counsellors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Agypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures: of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste, though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his private carriage, he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: Is not he the sonne of Ierubbaal? and Zebul is his Officer. Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Aner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Ioshab for his crueltye, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite living then in Agypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appears by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idleness and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of government vpon others; and vpon icalousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. About all other prooffs is the advancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph: Only in the Kings throne will I be above thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt. William, Archbisshop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirms that the like or very same forme of government of Pteropis, was in his time practised in Agypt, hauing there bene inuile (as he beleueed) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainly shewes, that the Soldans of Agypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they haue bene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill government, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall read in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphe, or Mulene Elhadech, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferior in wisdom.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Agyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethren called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is Gen. 41. 38. & not unlikely that the vainglorious Agyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of

of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say, Diodorus, that Sesostris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas: which could not have beene, if Menas had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many kindred linages or sorts of men. Now by whatlocuer means a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office: or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwaies passed by descent, and not by election: which besides consent of Authors the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the land of Aegypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children hereby either haue beene inthrall amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor: or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue become more mighty then the King: as Land-lords of all Aegypt, and the King himselfe their Tenant. Likewife we finde in Exod. 1. that God (moose the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Egypt it is said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the ancient King.

§. IIII.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Ofiris.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Aegypt is called in the Scripture, the land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Pute, or Canaan, as well as Aegypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Ofiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying, Nihil patris Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sum Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro, & generosus ortum: which must needs be vnderstood of Cham: for this Saturnus Aegyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Aegyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Aegypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicu faith, that the Aegyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrey Ham: as in foure severall places in the Psalms this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Orius, noting out of Plutarch in Ofiride, that in the sacrifices of the Aegyptians this Countrey of Aegypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia: ut puto (saith he) à Cham Nepotulo, to which also he addeth out of Isidore, Aegyptum vsq. hodie Aegyptiorum lingua Kam vocari: that Aegypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Aegyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be allcaged, which I haue already giuen in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem liued 600: Arphachad and Shelah each about 400. But strange it had beene, if one Salus created by Manthe, had in those long-liued generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Baon, Apachnas, Apochu, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Ofiris. Orus, and Sesostris. Reineccius in hissor. Italia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Ofiris according to Diodorus: who saith he was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzheimius saith that Mizraim and Ofiris are words of neere affinitie and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Aegypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Aegypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mexue. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Ofiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, and hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Ofiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely let downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities: That hee is not vainly said by Annus his Berosus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who

anoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: which habitation of Ofiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynasty, I can well beleue, assenting so farre to Reineccius, who thinkes the Dynasties were named only according to the severall seats of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Ofiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Aegypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Ofiris.

He death of Ofiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lehabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybius, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeere of Baleus King of Affryria: before which yeere he had made many great warres in Aegypt, Phancia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and having ended his Aegyptian warres, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus farre Berosus, or authors following nerosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were tiled) held the Kingdom of Ofis, Diodorus Siculus plainly like: and Plutarch as much; to which all Histories agree, Krentzheimius hercup inferres, that fixe yeeres may be allowed to the warres, vsq. t. Ofis. Diodorus made in so many Countries, after the Aegyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Ofiris haue beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeeres. I thinke that Krentzheimius was a greater Scholler in Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting, a farre longer time would haue beene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation, yet would it well agree with his intent: which was (doublelesse) to finde the truth. If according to his account the death of Ofiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Aegypt but seven yeeres before the death of Ofiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleueed. For it was the same king who aduanced Ioseph, bade him send for his Father; and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Ofiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh yeere of Israels coming into Aegypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeeres from that number, which Krentzheimius coniectures his reigne to haue continued: namely seven which hee should haue liued after Iacobs coming into Aegypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seven in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Ofiris, yet before Iosephs aduancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybius his wars. For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to haue indured 100. yeeres: After which proportion we may well giue not onely fixe yeeres, as Krentzheimius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: yea, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeeres, which passed betwene the time of Iosephs being sold into Aegypt, vnto his aduancement: considering that Putiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to haue beene, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Aegypt, as the tyrannous vlsurpation of Typhon must needs haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Ofiris, was by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a iust man, and one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Aegyptian followers (many of whom he had found either fall-harted, or weake and vnlucky in the troublesome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further and say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh, and all his seruants; then Putiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, and his iniurious imprisonment: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife, and being old, resigned his office of chiefe Steward vnto him; who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did fauour the Priests, when he bought the lands of all other Aegyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not valike to the frierly booke of Afenath, Puiphars daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes usually by meanes: and that Puiphars was the Steward of that king, vnder whom Iacob died: it would seeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning he should haue spent 42. yeeres after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italie, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian was considered, and his former enterprises and achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture doe confirme it. Neuerthelesse I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, nor well agreeing nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

§. VI.

Of Thyphon, Hercules, Egyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostris.

Concerning the reignes of Thyphon and of Hercules, I finde none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrator giueth three hundred yeeres to Thyphon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptorie without proofe, as it his owne word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; alludging no witness, but as it were saying, Tell me yf so: yet herein we may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules chidevery soone vnder take his Fathers reuenge: and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Egypt to his brother, he followed other warres, in the same quarrell, as hath bene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Thyphon: yet seeing Auentinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleue it. That in the reignes of Thyphon and Hercules, seuen yeeres were spent, how forer divided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius onely, who placeth the beginning of Orus seuen yeeres after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now where as he alloweth 90. yeeres of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Thyphon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemes that the reignes of Orus lasted 115. yeeres. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeeres by our account: who (according to Berosus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham 352

From that time to the <sup>Evocation of</sup> Abraham 75 departure out of Egypt 430 Summa 857

which summe diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeeres from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Sesostris or Sesosthis: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholastes Apollonij: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia: to haue built a fleet of ships on the Red Sea: and so to haue entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Iustine erring in account of his time calleth Pexoris: For Iustine placeth Pexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostris, if he were Pexoris, was more ancient then was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether vnlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gerar, and gaue it to his daughter: (as wee may reade more at large in the holy historie of the Bible) after which time Sesac oppressed Rehoboam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, when hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Vaphres and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostris. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as he came into Iudas with with a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostris next to Orus: following the Scholastes Apollonij. But further answer may be made to them that they were not one. For as Iustine witnesseth, Sesostris, otherwise Pexoris, made warre on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostris, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse: Sesac had 60000. Sesostris had 8000. Chariots, Sesac but 1200. Sesostris made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose then the conquest of Ierusalem, and giue him countenance in his new reign: whom he had liured euen against Salomon: therefore Sesostris must needs haue reigned whilest Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menas, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succcede those fiftene gods, namely, the twelue greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Menas. Which name, as also Menaus, and Menis, were titles of dignitie: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menas was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, which name Tex-maximus might well be attributed to Osiris, who was a great Conquerour, Philosopher, and benefactor to mankind, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In prowess and great vnder takings Sesostris was no whit inferior to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being well contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in which hee was, being by his owne brother purposely fired: which neuerthelesse he is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirte three yeeres: after which time he chose rather to die then to liue; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesostris left a sonne, whose name was Pheron or Pheronis: who afterwards tooke the name of Sesostris; but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blinde. The cause of his blindness: Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the River Nilus with a iaueline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the disease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is no where exprest: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Busris) who succeeded him, began 14. yeeres after that this Sesostris had bene king, it must needs be that this reigned 14. yeeres at least. That Busris began not vntill these 14. yeeres at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon, to haue bene 25. yeeres. That none came betweene Sesostris the second and Busris or Orus the second, it stands onely vpon probabilities: which are these. After Sesostris had reigned somewhile, he fell blinde: after certaine yeeres he recovered his sight, as is said: which may haue bene true, but is more like to haue bene a fable: surely the manner of his recovery as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely that by looking vpon a woman, or washing his eyes with her water, who had onely knowne her owne husband, he got his sight againe. As the time of his reignes, before his blindness, and when he was well againe (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: so his workes which were great, doe much more strongly argue, that his reignes was not very short. His words are largely set downe by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of which may seeme to haue bene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and lucres of Nilus: whom I thinke he rather frightened, (as his Father had done) with spades and shouels, then with darts, and iauelins; and by his diligent ouer-sight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it.

§. VII.

Of Busiris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queene Thermutis that took up Moses out of the water.

Nnd herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Busiris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busiris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it well appeared, by the drudgerie wherewith he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesoftris, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the oversight of those busineses, he had good opportunitie to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry: and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king: as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnlesse hee haue either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreouer he sought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Aegyptians, to the Israelites: he surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slacke in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busiris was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Cedrenus) lasted ten months: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers, who also thinke: that hereupon grew the fable of Busiris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busiris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinke him Author of the bloody edict. Neuertheless, true it is, that Busiris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne five yeeres after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began; which Busiris thinke to haue lasted 87. yeeres, ere the departure out of Aegypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesoftris the second, how great the power of the Regents or Viceroges in Aegypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them; seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that he bought all Aegypt, and all the Aegyptians for bread; giving at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing: seeing also that when the Aegyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph; what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue govern'd himselfe, would giue such trust, & soueraigne authority; it is not vnlikely that a blind Prince should doe it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not onely the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdom to him, though his reigne was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesoftris. But whether Busiris did vlturpe the kingdom, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busiris were onely Regent, whilst the king liued, and afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke up Moses, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel, seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesoftris the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busiris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeeres which passed betwene the beginning of Sesoftris his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent; the 75. which remaine, are to be accounted to Busiris or Orus the second, and his children. Busiris himselfe reigned 30. yeeres, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approue. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeeres: Her name was Thermutis Pharac, or Muthis according to Cedrenus: Euseb. calls her Athenis: & out of Artabanus his History Muris; Ioseph calls her both Athenis, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that shee was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis the daughter of Amenophis, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busiris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others: but but whether he were a king or onely a Regent I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus, Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesoftris, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Aegyptians called rather the neece or grand-child, then the daughter of Pharaoh, because of the glory of Sesoftris, and the disreputation of his sonne. If so, and if that Busiris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her, then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-child, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and suruiuing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeeres. But if she were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queene Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

He had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her, the other Telegonus, who is onely named by Eusebius, but his lineage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his fathers death reigned nine yeeres: after whom Cheneres, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten yeeres, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Cheneres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon 10: of which Historie elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cheneres (whom some call Athencheres: but all or most doe stile Cheneres, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeeres; and then Cherres 15. This descent seemes from Father to sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Aegypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not unlikely: viz. That Aegypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and armie in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the later of whom, or his posterity seemes to haue taken all 30: from Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. For whereas Armais is said to haue reigned foure yeeres after Cherres: and Armeis one after Armais: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue bene five yeeres. His name is called Armeus, otherwile Danau: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Italia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busiris.

Aegyptus or Ramestes who gaue name to the Countie, hauing expelled his brother Danau, reigned, and begat Lyncus, inarrited to Hypermetra.

Danau or Armeus expelled by his brother Aegyptus, after hee had reigned five yeeres, became king of Argas in Greece: was Father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdom after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himselfe is reported by Eusebius to haue bene borne in the time of Cheneres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danau & Aegyptus, otherwile called Armeus and Ramestes, was equally distant from Busiris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very young, it appears by the Historie of these two brethren, Danau and and Aegyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the later 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Howsoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armenus or Darius did succcede Cherres: and according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeeres. Rameffes followed, who reigned 68. yeeres. This Rameffes or Aegyptus is that Armesefmianum or Armesefmianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mercator, and of Bunting that followes Mercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Edict made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Mercators opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Goe, retorne to Aegypt, for they are all dead which went about to kill thee: Mercator hereupon conceiues, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moses was borne, and vnder whom he slew the Aegyptian at the 40. yeere of his age: and fled into the wildernesse, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, then a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Aegyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeeres more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successours from Themos (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downewards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betwene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses borne vnder Armesefmianum: and Israel deliuered in the dayes of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seemes to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flourished either as a king, or a wife man about the time of Isaac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Mercator was a man of excellent learning and industrie: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable workes: yet my assent herein is withheld from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Cherres was King who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. all are dead, &c. may better be vnderstood of Bafiris and all his children, then of one king alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrril in his first booke against Iulian the Apostata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeeres old: Rameffes, which was this Armesefmianum, being then king of Aegypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeeres: who is thought by Mercator and preumptorially by Bunting pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronological Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deliuerance of Israel out of Aegypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly ouerpasse.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuey of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

Rue it is that the Historie it selfe is generally and well knowne: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are verie neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Vives in his annotations vpon Saint Augustine citeth very many of their coniectures: as that of Porphyrie out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: but it hee did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrarie to all Stories Diuine and humane; while that Semiramis liued, shee commanded Syria, and all the parts there of absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in rerum natura.

A second opinion hee remembreth of Apion, taken from Ptolomie a Priest of Mendes, who saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argiues, and Amesif in Aegypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke Historie the first booke: that Moses was borne while: Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Aegyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian warre, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Musaeus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Arctapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Musaeus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Aegypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermothes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses vir Deo conuinctissimus is called Musaeus Iudaeorum. Eusebius in his Chronologie, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Aegypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thomosis: the same perchance which Apion the Grammarians will haue to bee Amesif, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Seihosis: to whom Ezrimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus called also Spherus or Iphereus, gouerned Affyria; Orthopolis, Sicyonia; and Crisus the Argiues; that then (Scythia the second ruling in Aegypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Aegypt. Eduxi Moses ex Aegypto populum Dei noui simo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium regis: Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Aegypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Aegypt best proued. S. Augustine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was borne: Saphrus gouerning Affyria: and that hee left Aegypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeeres; his successor Manelus 30. yeeres: Sparetus after him 40. yeeres: in whose fourth yeere Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Afcataides followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Affyria, Orthopolis Sicyonia; and Crisus Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Aegypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeere of the Affyrian Saphrus: for take one yeere remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which add the thirty yeeres of Manelus, melus, and the 40. yeeres of Sparetus, these make 71. with which there were wasted three yeeres of Cecrops: his 50. yeeres: then take nine yeeres out of the reigne of Ascatades, who was Sparetus succedour, those nine yeeres added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Agypt: and adde these nine yeeres to the three yeeres of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeeres of Cecrops his 50: and so it falleth right with S. Augustinus words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Agypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppressed in Agypt, seemeth to haue had beginning some eight or nine yeeres before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeeres, or rather more, after Ioseph: betweene whose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeeres: some of which time, and 80. yeeres after, they lived in great sterilitie and miserie. For as it is written in Exodus: They set task-masters over them, to keepe them under with burdens: and they built the Cities, Pithom and Ramases, &c. And by crueltie they caused the children of Israel to serue; and made them weary of their lives, by sore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All which laid vpon them by a mastering power and strong hand, they endured to the time by the wisdom of God appointed: euen from 54. yeeres, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when he last lasted 2370. yeeres, to the eightieth yeere of Moses, and vntill he wrought his miracles in the field of Zoan, which hee performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things which we deliuer of Agypt, may the better be vnderstood, I thinke it necessary to speake a few words of the principall places therein named, in this discourse.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Agypt, mentioned in this storie, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

His Citie which the Hebrewes call Zoan, was built seven yeeres after Hebron. Ezekiel calleth it Taphnes; and so doth Hieremie, the Septuagint, Tanis, Iosephus, Protatides after the name of an Aegyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of Thamis; Hegeppus, Thamma; and William Tyrtius, Tapis. It adioyneth to the land of Gosen, and is the same, where in Jeremie the Prophet was stoned to death, for preaching against the Aegyptian and Iewish Idolatry.

Zoan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Agypt, in which their Pharaohs then commonly resided; and not vnkely to be same Citie, where Abraham in his time found him. But Eusebius out of Ariapannus affirmeth, that Abraham had deade Astronomie in Helopolis, or On, to Pharaotes King of Agypt. Alex. Polyhistor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwise, saying, that Abraham instructed the Aegyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zoan write Helopolis. Paginus, Vatablus, Iunius, and our Englishe call it On, and Ptolemie, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Agypt, towards the South; the other somewhat lower on the Easter-most branch of Nelus falling into the Sea at Pelusi. And it may be that Helopolis to the South of the river Traian, was the same which Vatablus and our Englishe call Auen. Of the latter it is that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge: the same, which Pomp. Mela and Plinie call Solis oppidum; Tyrtius in the Holy Warre, Malbee; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simon Sethi, Font Solis. Of this Helopolis, or On, was Puthar Priest, or Prince, whose daughter Ioseph married. In the Territory adioyning Jacob inhabited, while hee liued in Agypt. In the confines of this Citie, Onias, the high Priest of the Jewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferiour to that of Iherusalem (Ptolomie Philopater then gouerning in Agypt) which stood in the time of Vespassian, 333. yeeres after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus falsly reporteth, herein to haue fulfilled a prophetic of Esaie. c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terra Aegypti, in stat day shall the Altar of the Lord bee in the midst of the Land of Aegypti. Anuochus Epiphaneas at that time of the building tyrannizing over the Jewes, gaue the occasion for the erecting of this Temple in Agypt. Lastly, theret was that our Saviour Christ Iesum remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (saith Brochard) the fountain taine is still found, called Iesum Well, whose streames doe afterward water the Gardens of Balsamum, no where else found in Agypt. And hereof see more in Brochard, in his description of Agypt.

There is also the Citie of Noph, remembred by Esaie and Ezekiel, the same which Herodotus calleth Aloph: which later name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, so called, which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great Citie, which was called Mempbis; and so the Septuagint write it. It is knowen to the Arabians by the name of Maszar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabry; and Tudalenfis Misram.

Pelusi, which Vatablus, Paginus, Iunius, and our Englishe write, Sin; the Septuagint call Sais and Montannu, Lehma; is not the same with Damiata, as Gul. Tyrtius wittelleth. In the time of Baldwin the third, Pelusi was called Belbeis. Belvers (saith Tyrtius) qua olim dicta est Pelusium; Belbeis, that in times past was called Pelusium.

The Citie of No, the Septuagint call Diopolis. Of which name there are two or three in Agypt. Hierome conuerts it Alexandria, by anticipation, because it was so called in the future.

Babalstus, (for so Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the same which the Hebrewes call Pitheth.

To make the storie the more perceiueable, I haue added a description of the land of Gosen, in which the Israelites inhabited; with those Cities and places so often remembred in the Scripture: as of Taphnes or Zoan, Helopolis or Belbeis, Succoth, and the rest; together with Moses passage through the Deserts of Arabia the Senie. For all storie without the knowledge of the places, wherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleasure; so it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderstanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing serue to retaine, what wee read, in our memories, so well as these pictures and descriptions doe. In which respect I am driuen to digresse in many places, and to interpose some such discourse, otherwise seeming impertinent: taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arius Montanus; who in his Preface to the Storie of the Holy Land, hath these words: Si enim absque locorum obseruatione res gesta narrentur, aut sine Topographica cognitione historia legatur, adeo confusa atq. perturbata erunt omnia, ut ex his nihil non effusum, nihil non difficile elici possit; si narratione (saith he) bee made of those things which are performed, without the obseruation of the places, wherein they were done: or if Histories bee read without Topographicall knowledge; all things will appeare so intricate and confused, as we shall thereby vnderstand nothing but obscurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greatest difficultie.

§. III.

Of the crueltie against the Israelites young children in Agypt: and of Moses his preservation, and education.

Vt to returne to the story it selfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and slauey, which the Israelites endured, yet they decreased not in numbers: insomuch as Pharaoh considering the danger of discontented pauerie, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his estate, by suggestion of the Deuill resolved to slaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as soone as they should be borne. To which end he sent for Sephora and Thura, women the most famous and expert amongst them, qua praeerant (saith Commettor) multitudini obstertricum, who had command giuen them over all mid-wives; by whom (as it seemeth) hee gaue order to all the rest for the execution of his Edict. For to haue called all the mid-wives of Agypt together, had become a strange Parliament. Now whether these two, before named, were of the Hebrewes, or of the Aegyptians, it is directly disputed. S. Augustinus calls them Hebrewes, because it is written Exodus the first, The King of Agypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women, &c. But Iosephus, Abulenfis, and Perenius beleeue them to be Aegyptians. Whosoever they were, when it pleased God to frustrate the execution of that secret murder, to the end the world might witness both the wickedness of the Aegyptians, and the iust cause, thereby made manifest, of his future indignation and reuenge: Pharaoh finding these women filled with pietie, & the feare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publicly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrews, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affording them the iustice, which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest hee might haue employed or sent away at his pleasure; Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was prophetically deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrews there should be borne a childe; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a meane, contrary to the lawes of Heauen and of nature) he stretched out his to Ietro long after practised, when fearing the spirituall kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue bene temporal, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtred. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of forknowledge of the future iustesse, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the first of Exodus: *Come, let vs worke wisely with them, lest they multiplie; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they ioyne themselves also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wilddome of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they reffe on the inuentions of their owne: most lesse, and altogether daikened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearly beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and minister of Gods maruellous workes taken out of Nilus, being therein twined off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infante. And this Princeesse hauing beheld the childe his forme and beautie, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preferre it, and cause it to be fostered; but commanded that it should be suckt as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, shee called the childe Moses, as it were, extractus, or eruptus, taken out, to wit, out of the water: or, after Iosephus and Glicias, Moy, a voyce expressing water, and Israhel, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of water, or thence taken.*

Strabo 1. 1. Clemens Alexandrinus was of opinion, that Moses was circumcised, before hee was put into the Arke of Reedes, & that Amram his father had named him Ioachim. In his youth he was carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quem regio more educant, praefectisq; eruditissimis Aegyptiorum Magistris, a quibus eruditur, cum Basil, vnto whom shee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wise Masters of the Aegyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Aegyptians; which also the Martyr Stephen, in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Aegyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or at least so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, wee haue added, betwene the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua.

§. IIII.

Of Moses his flying out of Agypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre in Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastoral life: and that of Peterius of the Bookes of Genesis and Iob.

When Moses was growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeeres warre that he made against the Aethiopians: of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyses, called Aetoe; and how he recovered that Citie by the fauour of Tharbis, a daughter of Aethiopia, whom he tooke to wife. So hath Commellor a prettie tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbis residing in two precious stones, whereof the one increased memorie; the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of obliuion, to his wife Tharbis, refering the other of memorie for himselfe: which ring of forgetfulness, after shee had a while worn, began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband: and so Moses without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeere of Moses age, when hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moued by compassion, in respect of his brother, and stirred vp by disdain against the other, in the contention hee slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering Countrie to Egypt; where wandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vnkowne vnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and who in future times were the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (working the greatest things by the weakest worldly meanes) to make the watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Midianite, an occasion whereby to prouide him a wife of one of those, and a father in law, that fed him, and sustained him in a Countrie neere Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessarie to be knowne, because interiect betwene Egypt and Iudaea, through which hee was to leade the Israelites; and wherein God held him, till the occasion which God presented, best serued. And lastly, where the glory of the world shined least, amidst mountainous Desarts, there the glorie of God, which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted childe of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a mecke and humble sheepe-heard, sitting at a mountaines foot; a keeper and commander of thole poore beasts onely.

In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, he consumed 40. yeeres. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flockes, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastoral knowledge; yet in that solitary Desart hee enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the world, and the troublefome affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all thole knowledges, whereof his younger yeeres had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastoral life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principallie, which he afterward obtained. Est enim (saith Philo) ars Pastoralis, quasi praeludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quomodo modum bellicosam ingentia praeferunt se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod postea in militia & bello perfectura sunt; brutis praebentibus materiam exercitij, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populi, non contumelia sed honoris gratia. The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introduction to exercise vnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Even as warlike natures doe before-hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on wilde beasts thole things, which after they will accomplish in warfare: thole brute beasts affording matter, wherein to traine themselves, both in time of warre and of peace. But the government of gentle cattell, hath a kinde of resemblance vnto a Kingly rule ouer subjects; therefore, Kings are stiled sheepe-heards of thole people, not in way of reproch, but for their honour.

That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, wrote the Booke of Iob, as Pererius supposeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob was at that time living. Neither dare I subscribe to Pererius opinion. That Moses while hee liued in that part of Arabia, wrote the booke of Genesis; although I cannot denie the reason of Pererius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assistance of their deliuerie from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Lard of rest, and plentie promised.

Of his calling backe into Agypt by the Angell of God, and the mannailes and wonders which he performed, thereby to perswade Pharaoh, that hee was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are written in the first foureene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that when Moses desired to be taught by God, by what name hee should make him knowne, and by whom he was sent; he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euer-being nature. Out of which he deliuered him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the wisest: and in his second, to be understood by all, For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe, but the Eternall: which truly is, which is aboue all; which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment;

ment; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as while one may say, Now. Likewise, whatsoever is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in every shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state, *Vna est Dei & sola natura qua verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed suum est. Cetera que creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit, it is the one and only nature of God, which truly is; for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not bene, may againe want being. And with this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Totæ rerum natura umbra est, aut inanitas, the whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith Esay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse then nothing, and meete vanitie.*

C. 40. v. 13.

C. 16. v. 5.

Of the tenth plague wherewith the Aegyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Rivers into blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Fore-fathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned, the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Revelation may bee fitly applied: And I heard the Angell of the water say, Lord, thou art iust, which art, and which wast, and holy, because thou hast judged these things: for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou given them blood to drinke.

The rest of the plagues by Froeges; Lice, Flies, or stinging Wasps, by the death of their Cattle; by leprous Scabbies, by Haile and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknesse; after which Pharaoh forbade Moses his presence: moued the hardened heart of the vablocking King no longer, then the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, atime wherein we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: whereas before, he first yielded unto the departure of the men, then of the men, women, and children, referring their beaftiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not only depart with all their owne, but with a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his owne people: of which (the feare being past) hee suddenly repented him, as his pursuit after them proved. For when every one of the Hebrewes had (according to Moses direction from Moses received) slaine a Lambe, without spot or blemish, for the Pasche, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vnspotted Sauour,) and with the blood thereof coloured the poste and lintene of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote euerie first-borne of Aegypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Begger and Slave: the children of the Israelites excepted. At which terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more then euer amazed, yielded, as before is said, to their departure. The Aegyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring with blood, which the Israelites vsed after the Passouer, ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely marke their Sheepe and Cattel, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserve them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

Now, when the people were removed, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) he thought him as well of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart with the spoiles of his people, and in despite of himselfe. And having before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted with himselfe, what way the Israelites were like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistims. But because these people were very strong, and a warlike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected that Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to wit, through the Desert of Eibane; and there, because the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered with multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Aegypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captiues ouer them, hee determined to set vpon them in the plains of Gosen, which way loeuer they turned themselves. For it was the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed with broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romans, while they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Armie of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot: which, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assault the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Armie, to set on them. For, as it is written in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things, eyther that the Hebrewes might ioyne themselves to his enemies within the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues which God grieued him withall, enforst him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Iosephus partiall in this affaire, yet by the words of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Aegypt: which could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he went on sixtente miles: which, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattel and Sheepe with them, pestered with a world of Women and Children, was a march witnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemie at hand. Now, as Moses well knew, that hee went out with a mightie hand, and that God guided his vnderstanding in all his Enterprizes: so hee lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vsing the vnderstanding which God had giuen him, hee left nothing vnperformed, becoming a Wise man, and a valiant and skilfull Conductor; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death well appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was enraged against him, & commanded him not to dare to come thenceforth into his presence: after that he had warned Israel of the Passouer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Rende-vous of all the Hebrewes at Ramases in the Territorie of Gosen; a Citie standing indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue commandement, that euery Family should bring with them such store as they had of Dow, and Pasture, not staying to make it into bread, knowing then that Pharaoh was on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men and Chariots, of which kinde of defence Moses was vterly vnprovided (though as it is written, the Israelites were vnparmed) he marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Etham, and incamped at Succoth; which hee performed on the fifteenth day of the Moneth Abib. Which Moneth from that time forward they were commanded to account as the first Moneth of the yeere. Whether in former times they had bene accustomed to begin their yeere in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Aegyptians, and were now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politicke yeere, which was not now abrogated, but rather by some solemnities therunto annexed, was confirmed, and still continued in vs. Wherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, vnto the beginning, middle, or ending of the yeere; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politicke yeere is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the whole forme of their yeere, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty yeeres space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to whose care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) was giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Calendar, was made publike, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I do not finde. Now because time and motion begin together, it will not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew here at their first setting forth, what was the forme of the Hebrew yeere: with the difference betwene them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

The territorie of Gosen was afterward called Ramases, after the name of this Citie, as appeareth in Gen. 47. 11. Exod. 13.

§. VI.

Of the Solarie and Lumarie yeeres: and how they are reconciled: with the forme of the Hebrew yeere, and their manner of intercalation.

The Hebrew Moneths are thus named.

The first Moneth, Nisan, or Abib.
The second, Iar, or Tiar, Zio, or Zin.
The third, Sinan, or Sinan, or Siban.
The fourth, Tamuz.
The fifth, Ab.
The sixth, Ebul.
The seventh, Tysri, or Ethawin, or Ethanim.
The eighth, Marchesuan, or Mechisuan, or Bul, or with Iosphu, Marfonane.
The ninth, Chisleu, or Casseu.
The tenth, Tebeth, or Thobeth.
The eleventh, Sebeth, or Sabath.
The twelfth, Adar, and Ve Adar.

N E Adar was an intercalarie Moneth, added, some yeeres, unto the other twelve, to make the Solarie and Lumarie yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconvenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed special Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a fit day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones; and the like: which could not haue so bene kept, if eyther the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe bene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to attaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commoditie of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driven in like manner to make their yeeres unquall, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more daies, as the error committed in foregoing yeeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most sauage of all people, when a yeere hath passed ouer them; yet the necessitie of ordinarie occurrences, that are to be numbered by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obserued the Monethly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelue parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. dayes and nights, and those againe into quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelue reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. daies or thereabout, than the yerely course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteen yeeres, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the yeere, making it to consist of twelue Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yerely reuolution by any set number of whole dayes; neyther did the Moone change alwaies at one houre; but the verie minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him, that would seeke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Heere lay much wisdome and deepe Art, which could not soone be brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the yeere to containe three hundred and sixtie daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Gracian yeere (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest

Plin. l. 2. c. 6. by that which Plinie directlie affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of

Demetrius

Demetrius Phalerens, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of dayes. By this account neyther did any certaine age of the Moone begin or end their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places: but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the dayes forgotten to be inserted into the Almanacke by men, but not forgotten by the superiour bodies in their courses, should occupie their owne roomes in their due turnes. No. v. because the solemnitie of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone, and withall on the 15. day of the Moneth Hecatombion (which answereth in a manner to our Iune) they were carefull to take order, that this Moneth might euer beginne with the new Moone; which they effected by adding some two daies to the last Moneth of euery yeere; those Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euen; which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Pardromion, (agreeing neerely with our August) sometimes not to omit it, or (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lumarie yeere, accounting by the Moone, after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keepe all vp right, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the second Posideon or December, which was the deuice of Harpalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and so successiue through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeere as neere as they could, unto the high way of the Planets; but these makes which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible so to fashion this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 11. houres and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 41. minutes; which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Meton the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation, deuised a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, met with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past shee had done. This invention of Meton was entertained with great applaue, and passing from Greece to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were annoyed the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vied; for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metons, that is to say, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astronomer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Caesar made, who by aduice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the yeere vnto the forme which is now in vye with vs, containing 365. daies and six houres, which houres in foure yeeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of February. The correction of the Julian yeere by Pope Gregorie the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the worke of Caesar: yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aquinaltiall on the 21. day of March, was in the yeere 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregorie strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that in stead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth; by which meanes the moueable Feasts depending on the Sunnes entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had bene. And the better to preuent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundredth yeere, the Lease day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yerely course take vp full fixe houres about the 365. daies; but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole dayes.

But

But the Cycle of 19. yeeres, which the Hebrewes vsed, was such as neither did need any nice curiositie of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neither did in summing vp the dayes of the whole yeere, neglect the dayes of the Moone, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kalends or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone, and because that day was fixtually, they were very carefull as well to obserue the short yeere of the Moone, passing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successiue 30. to one, 29. to another. Hereby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euently two revolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odd minutes, from change to change. The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. yeeres; to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common yeere (as appeareth by the feuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the yeere, wherein the Sunne finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoever they were neglected in one yeere, yet in the Cycle of 19. yeeres were so disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sunne and Moone were found on the same day of the yeere, Moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had bene at the beginning of it 19. yeeres before.

lib. 3. c. 1.

Diners haue diuerly set downe the forme of the Hebrew yeere, with the manner of their Intercalations. Stigonius tells vs, that euery second yeere they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth yeere a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a yeere of the Sun. But herein Stigonius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes; and therefore to haue added so many dayes to the end of the yeere, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the yeeres following, which could not haue begun as they ought, with the new Moone. Genebrard saith, that euery third yeere, or second yeere, as he need requir'd, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the yeeres end vnto the other 12. This I beleue to haue bene true; but in which of the yeeres the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) methinks they doe not probably deliuer, who keepe all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. yeeres. For (to omit such as erre grossly) some there are who say, that after three yeeres, when besides the dayes spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. dayes are left remaining, that is, 11. dayes of each yeere; then did the Hebrewes adde a Moneth of 30. dayes; keeping three dayes, as it were in plussage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the fixt yeere; at which time, besides the Intercalarie Moneth, remained fixe daies, namely, three surmounting that Moneth, and the Epact of three yeeres, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. yeere; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand; all which with the Epact of the 19. yeere, make vp a Moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle makes all euene.

Whether this were the practice, I can neither affirm nor denie, yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. yeere euery Moneth were remoued from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the yeere and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnauoydable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. yeere. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and fixt yeeres, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. yeeres, doe fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the yere following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helps to make the yeeres ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and yeeres, by which they guided their accounts,

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea, and of the diners wayes leading out of Egypt.

From Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recouer the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wildernesse, though he intended nothing lesse then to goe out of that way, of all other the easiest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemen and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed, by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he rested but one night, and then he reflected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betwene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabis being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall; the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desert and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that faithelesse he should haue overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wildernesse hath shut them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses by turning another way did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East-side of the Land of Gosen, or Ramesses: from whence (missing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult: by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoever, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horse and Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only while he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance and victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strength of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wise conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Valley of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant; and fate downe betwene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South: the fume which Orosius calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Had. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specule, siue custodie, Lord of the watch-towre. For the Egyptians beleueed, or at least made their flauies beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Egypti dy's sacundi; The Egyptians were fruitful in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who incamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towre asleepe, or out of countenance.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Casiotia, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Iadaa, as the other by Etham, from which he reflected, for the reasons before remembred, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betwene the Mountaines, which made a straight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horse-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate sight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brink and wash of the Sea: insomuch as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence; laying it to Moses charge, that themselves forsooke those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisdome, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strength and multitudes.

fixe leagues in breadth, and the faine also filled every where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe: 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth v<sup>p</sup> between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Aethiopia and Aegypt on the other, as far as Sues, the vttermoſt end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turke now keepeth his Fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Mojes part, is called Hieropolites of the Citie Mary, sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Plinie callt it Cambijū, by which name it was knowne, faith he, before it was called Hero many yeeres. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it, Alenticum: King Inba Lenticum, others more properly Elanticum, of the Port and Citie Elina: which the Sep-3 Kings 9. tuingint call Elath: Ptolomee, Elana: Plinie, Lana: Iosephus, Iana, and Marius Niger, Alla: 10f. Ant. 8. c. 2. there is also Halab in Affrya, to which Salmanassar carryed the Israelites captiue, Chrys 2. c. 8. v. 11. which Halab in Affrya, the Septuagint call Elata: and in the first of Chrom, the 6. Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moores and Arabians (as falsly to the Turke) know it by no other appellation, then the Gulfe of Mecca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraeum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythrae: and because Erythras in the Greeke lignifieth Red: hence it is, that, being denominated of this Erythrae, the sonne of Perſeus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quin. Curtius coniectureth: which Arian, de geſt. Aes. Meg. l. 1. Strabo confirme. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discouery of that Sea in the yeere 1544. performed by Steuens Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of redneſſe, both from the banks, cliffs, and lands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Caſtro, a principall Commander vnder Gama (which discouery I giue Maſter Richard Hadley to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalaguca, sometime Legues, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth, the earth, lands, and cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Caſtro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying as it doth Northerly and Southerly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth, or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, giue a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottom of this Sea towards the Ithre, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, and elsewhere. There are also the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, faith Strabo, and those growing vnder water, may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of redneſſe by the shadowes of these stones, sands, earth, and cliffs, I suppose that it first tooke the name of the Red Sea, because in many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade eighth Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion Gaber adioyning, now Toro, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Eraniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16 or 17 Leagues together, along Northward towards Suez, some three Leagues or nine English miles ouer, and from this Port of Toro to Suez, and the end of this Sea, it is in length about 28 Leagues, of which the first 26 have nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Agypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, & streighten it so fast, as for five miles together it is not about three miles ouer; from thence vpward the land on Agypt side, fallth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Cove for some ten miles together; after which the land grows vpon the Sea againe, and bo binds it into the very end thereof, at four miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer-against Elana or Toro, but without iudgement: for from Ramfess to Pihacherob and Baalzephon, there is not about 30 miles interiacent; or 35 miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three dayes: and betwene the land of Agypt opposite to Elana or Toro, the distance is about 80 miles. For Ramfess, to which Cities Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gosen) from hee left Pharao at Zoan, and tooke his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrional Latitude; and Migdal, or the Valley of Pihacherob, at the foot of the Mountain Climax, or Baalzephon, in nine and twentie and a halfe, which made a difference of five and three English miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

§. IX.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

THe Aegyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes have objected that Moses past over the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharao conducted more by furie then discretion, pursued him so far as before he could recouer the coast of Aegypt, he was ouer-taken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand and rod of Moses (which authority to ment that beleue not therein, perfwadeh nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there beene no other working power from above, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his Armie haue perished in that pursuit.

For where soeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downeward towards the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebb, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Midol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand drie and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the water, ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea then Sues, and betweene it and where Moses past: who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: It followeth then, that if all that part of the Sleue or Strait, had beene by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharao found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Aegypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth; but that Moses past on betweene two Seas, and that the waters were diuided. Otherwise, Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue beene a power above nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby was caused an ebbe more then ordinarie: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but, in effect North and South. And it must haue beene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driven those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South, and maine body thereof: the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnkowne to Pharao: while he was checkt by that Sea which vied in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him and ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Capitaine, as he ouer-threw the Ethiopians in battels, being imploied by Pharao, and wanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it were barbarous to condemne him of this grossefence, and distraction: that rather then he would haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that way, and foretold him of the honour which hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he would haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing water. For hee knew not the contrarie, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth he did. For the people, beholding *Pharao*s approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safety: and when Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee was answered by God: wherefore cryest thou vnto me? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward, and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: which proues that there was not at the time of *Pharao*s approach any ebbe at all; but that God did disperse and cut through the weight of waters, by a strong East-winde, whereby the Sands

discovered themselves betweene the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters to defended them on both sides, as the Aegyptians could onely follow them in the same path; not that the waters stood vpright as wals doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharao and the Aegyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chace and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can thinke, that Pharao and the Aegyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes and refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Countrey, on his owne Coast, & in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of yeeres experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as he was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknowne or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their owne prosperitie, they least discern it comming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Armie of the Aegyptians had beene ouer-taken by the ordinary returne of the flood, before they could recouer their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue beene carried with the flood which runneth vnto Sues, and to the end of that Sea, and not haue beene cast all here on that coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-banke ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; and not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would haue carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must haue done from Aegypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepe the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcases should haue beene carried, if the worke had not beene supernaturall and miraculous. Apollonius in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Aegyptians which staid in the Countrey, and did not follow Pharao in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honor those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were buid at the time of *Pharao*s destruction: as he that was then labouring in his Garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall be giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. yeeres after Christ, the prints of *Pharao*s Chariot wheelles were to be seene at a low water on the Aegyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared againe. But herof I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe.

CHAP. IV.

Of the iourning of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: with a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites meet with the Israelites.

BVt to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeere of the World 2434. Saphrus then gouerning Assyria; Orthopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesius, Crisus the Argines; Orus Aegypt, Adi-7, Ismael 14, and Demulion Thessalie: He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. yeeres. 2474. in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeeres after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandement and ordinance of God into Aegypt, and wrought his 14. his miracles in the fields of Zaan, in the yeere 2514, the last moneth of that yeere. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew month Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the dayes they at Sunne setting, in the yeere of the World 2514. was the celebration of the Passeouer: and in the dead of the night of the same day were all the first-borne slaine through Agypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrews called Abib, being about the beginning of the yeere of the World 2514. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall assembly at Ramses, and marched to Succoth.

Exod. 11.
Num. 33.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and iourning from Etham, they incamped in the Valley of Pihacheroth, or Migdol, vnder the Mountaine Bazephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Armie perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses having recovered the bankes of Arabia, gaue thanks vnto God, for the deliuerie of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entered the Deserts of Arabia Petrea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desert of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel prest with extreame thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach in Pihacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing nere a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same thereinto, made the same sweeter: a plaine pipe, and figure of our Saviour; who vpon the tree of the Crosse changed the bitterness of euerylasting death into the sweetnesse of eternall life. Plinie remembereth this bitter Fountaine in his sixth Booke and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Agypt, Sesotris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolomie the second, began to cut an artificiall Riuer, thereby by Boats and small Shipping to trade and navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Niles. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelue Fountaines of sweet water, and three-score and ten Palmie trees, he rested diuers dayes.

Exod. 15.
Num. 33.

Exod. 15.
Num. 33.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or Citie in Moses time, I cannot affirme. And yet the scarcitie of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his Historie of the Holie Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient Citie. And at such time as Baldwine the first past that way into Agypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Civitas antiquissimam populo Israelitico aliquando familiarem; ad quam cum pervenisset, loci illius incolae, Regis aduentum praenitio, manculam ingredientiem, in mare vicinum fecerunt, Entring Helim a very ancient Citie, well knowne sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach,ooke Boates, and shifted themselves into the Sea, lying nere them. From Elim he returned againe towards the South, and came downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seventh Mansion. For it seemeth that hee had knowledge of Amalech, who prepared to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountering with the least miserie, were more apt to returne to their quiet slauerie, than either to endure the wants and perils which every where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemy: hee therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of this second Moneth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desert of Zim, where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, having want of food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the red Sea, but in the collection of euery severall incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, it is set downe.

Exod. 16.

Exod. 16.

Here it pleased God to send fo many flights of Quails, as all the Countrie about their incamping was covered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being so the sixteenth of their Moneth, which served them instead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Agypt. And though they had great numbers of Cattell, and Sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feede themselves with many of those: but reserved them both for the milke to releeue the children withall: and for breed to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twentie miles: the one to to Daphca, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim fixe miles. Here being againe prest with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Agypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casuall and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazards and traiailes which every manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their owne freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the Rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

Exod. 17.

§. II.

Of the Amalekites, Medianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethros coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Midian.

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and guessed that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Countrie (which being barren of it selfe, would be vterly waisted by so great a multitude of People and Cattell) thought their most for their advantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of man infiebled them. On the other side Moses perceiving their resolutions, gaue charge to Ishua, to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Betweene whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equall hopes and repulies for many houres. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God bene of farre greater force, and more prevalent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly indamaged the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnacquainted with scarcity of food, and those mindes whom a ferule education hath dulled, being beaten, and depaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought againe to hazard themselves.

Exod. 17.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him Moses his wife, and his two Sonnes, which either Iethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receive, till hee had by this overthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v. 1. when Iethro the Priest of Midian, Moses father in law heard what God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the overthrow of Amalech gaue Iethro courage and assurance, he then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai, where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuerfies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Medianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Iudges v. 11 & 17. it is manifest; where it is written; Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from among the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kadesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plaines, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites: Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou shalt put thy nest in the Rocke. And that Saul spared this Nation, he gieth for cause, that they shewed mercie to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Agypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Medianites, and the Medianites were of the illies of Midian, one of the fixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who as it seemeth kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they received from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when he fled out of Agypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them idolaters) haue made Iethros Daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherite their lands; yet it cannot be meant by these; who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the

Num. 24. v. 12
Sam. 1. c. 15.

Gen. 25.

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chus. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites and Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as is before remembered, Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kadesh or Kadesb. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my selfe to better iudgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and Heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to have bene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites assisted Israel, and guided them in the Deserts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian of whom Iethro was Priest, and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not have sent 120000 Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plains of Moab, to have destroyed that Madian, where his wines kindred inhabited, seeing himselfe coming with 600000 able men, was encountered by Amalech in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Deserts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandered 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Iothor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Hobab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Valar or Sepharaim, which call him Raguel, and our English Reuel, Exodus 2. 18. calls him Iethro or Iothor, Exod. 1. & v. 1. & 4. v. 18. & 6. 9. 10 & 12. and in Numer. c. 10. v. 29. Hobab. Others take Iethro & Hobab to be the same, but not Raguel.

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given, with diuers commendations of the intution of Lawes.

The first of the months of this yeere 2515. were spent in the Desert of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Eusebius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierome to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalm v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 1. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one. which heard (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgement of the vengeance. Somewhat they are disioyned at the top by the report of Peter Belonius, who in the yeere 1588. past out of Aegypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumet of France, and trauiled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by farre the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marronites, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.

Now, that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses's time, it is very probable: First, because he incamped thereabout almost a yeere, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is writt, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, he cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angell of God was giuen to Moses, where hee staied staied a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue dayes: for he remoued not till the 30. day of the second month of the second yeere; and hee arriued about the 45. day after the egression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law, and the kinds and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way disioyned, hee may turne ouer a few leaues, and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can be neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, leuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to govern that multitude which he conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed direction of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in general, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall law deduced, the rule of all his Creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and virtuous men; yea, the very spirit, & the very finewes of currey Elite in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what hee hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which were taken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, received their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycurgus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romans sometime from their first Kings, from their Decem-viri, from their Senatours, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

The word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vied. For if we consider it at large, it may be vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And for the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any private ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees doe also vniuersally that title, according to the generall acceptation of the word Law: of which Esay Woe vnto them that decree wicked decrees, and write grieuous things. Likewise, the word is vied for the tumultuarie resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vnjust: Malis lex est, que tumultuarie posita est. It is an ill law that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, cyther good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe, as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuines call legem sensus, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as elsewhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or figmentum of the heart: so in S. Paul to the Romans it is called a Law: But I see another Law in my members, rebelling against the Law of the minde, and leading me captive vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclination of all creatures are sometime called a lawes, so farre as they agree with the reason of the law eternall, as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Allo private contracts among Merchants and other Trade-men, doe often put on the name of Lawes. But law commonly and properly is taken, for a right rule, prescribing a necessarie meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The rest, to wit, the commandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges iniquae, are by Thomas called violencia magis quam leges; rather compulsion then lawes: And whatsoever is not iust, S. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, whosoever established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quae nec cura discenda, nec putanda sunt; The unjust constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought lawes. For saith Aristotle, Legalia iusta sunt factiua, & conseruatiua felicitatis; iust lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euertlasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the law, saith Plato, is God and his worship: Finitis leges Deum & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines ad legendo, or ad ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quilibet & ad populum latae, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, & behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymologic, ad ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confringerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalm, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & projiciamus a nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs breake their bands in iudice, and cast away their cords from vs.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditionall promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntarie submission of themselves vnto it: for which word the Separing, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vsf the word διαθήκη, a Testament or last Will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectuall for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator, for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the law Thorah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reigne of the law, is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vitæ regula, præcipiens quæ sunt sequenda, & quæ fugienda. Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shunne: or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queen or Princesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisdome of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called Index sui & curui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the iudge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directiue rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and essence, consist in vnderstanding: Concludit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Ius is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Ius Ciuile, or Ius gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Ius and Fas: wherof Ius, saith he, hath reference to men, Fas to God. Fas lex diuina, Ius lex humana. To goe ouer another mans field, is permitted, by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsf both these words: as Fas & iura sinunt, God and men permit.

The word Ius or Right, is deriued or taken from the olde substantiue Nowne iussus, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greeke δίκη, which is the name of Iudicium, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis; because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgements is Gods. For as it is certaine that ius-iurandum came of Iouis-iurandum, (for so we finde it written in Nomus out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum lebonæ) so also we may say, that Ius came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Picegerents the Magistrates, hee is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Ius the iust are denominated, iustus iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V.

Of the definition of Lawes, and of the law eternall.

BEcause lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leauing the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna est aeternus diuina sapientia conceptus, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præcognitatur; The eternall law is the eternall concepts of Gods wisdome as it is referred to the government of things fore-knownne by himselfe. Or Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio diuina sapientia: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis adferat; It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessitie according to their seuerall nature, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directs all these to their proper ends; so it is called prouidence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the natures of all things which it directeth, so is it called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero tooke knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delicto auocans: quæ non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem simul est cum mente diuina: quamobrem lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendam & ad vetandam, ratio est recta summi Iouis; That perfect reason and nature of things incouraging or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith he) then beginne to bee a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true Law and a fit Princesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man findes it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessarie, as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as the rule vniuersall: and thero referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration; the eternall directing more largely: as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the Naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a stream from this fountaine.

The law humane or temporall is also thence drawn; in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creatures, or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall, or morall, and humane. For the law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creatour and Directour: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heavens of heavens: for he hath established them for ever & ever. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Depths: Fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormie winds, which execute his Word: mountaines and hills, fruitfull trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattell, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicitie proposed vnto them (beatitudine being both the attractive, and the end) to all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their owne natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, knowne cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatsoeuer is opposed. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate, a difference vied in times only; it being no other then Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in this world the more derived: there vnder subiected: thence from by his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolmen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or apperception, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex aeterna est, qua iustum est: et omnia sunt ordinatissima; the law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-Will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Padagogie of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should bee expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Saviour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatus est. But I rather thinke these words of our Saviour to haue no other signification, then that now the propheticie of their giuing him Vinegar to drinke was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when he saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, vt consummaretur Scriptura. That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I denie not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Jewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe, but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Salomon, And being one (see) can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe reneweth all.

§. VI. Of the Law of Nature.

 The law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolmen: onely as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. Primum defines the naturall law to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures; Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Iustitiam hominibus generis propriam, sed omnium animalium quae terra marique nascuntur, animi quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produce.

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, enlightning their formall reason; so is it more then sense in Beasts; and more then vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their liues: seeing that Bulles and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, then the least kinde of Dogges; and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and flieth from the other, yea, though by them neuer sense before; and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Birds to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twiggies which hang ouer Riuers, and not on any other part of the tree, or elsewhere: to save their egges and young ones from the Monkees, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may be giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitus, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and inuolupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations were by Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Lycurgus it was permitted to men to vse one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to chiole them: others besides their Husbands, to beget their child: which Law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Scythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloued wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembered by G. Valentinus, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay guile with guile: to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that injury is not done to him that is willing: to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light, the other, the dictate or sentence of practique reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exercise of iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which wee would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the Law of nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David sheweth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increased and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature those things contained in the Law: they haue not the Law, are a Law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right vnto all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation; In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witness of those effects: and the reprobate their thoughts to accuse them.

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

AFTER the eternall, and naturall, the law positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine and Humane. Again, the diuine positive law is double; the Olde and New: The Olde was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 2512. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Asatades or Asacades gouerned the Affryrians, Marathus the Scythians, Triopus the Argines, Cecrops Athenes, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seems, was the first written law which the world receyued. For the very word Nomes, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no not in Homer time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast down 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his exprell will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that so these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their lines long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not reade, in their owne consciences. The Schoolemen, and the Fathers before them, impute the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefest.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The Law of the Lord is sanctified, conuincing foules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, mereth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our minds. For the Lawes of men can only take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our foules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists. Actioes hominum nulle essent, nisi prius in mente dicerentur; The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of trueth, which by reason of diuersities of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot be assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also sayde Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing Wisdom to children.

§. VIII. Of the unwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NOW, that in all this long tract of time, betwene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoever was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered out by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Jewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Jewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reuealed in the bosoms of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeede the diuine law reuealed to the Patriarkes, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not onely to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable, &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruites, but the forbidden, and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence after being commanded to cohabit with their Wives, rather than with their Father and Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntuall, and reuenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth. Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be vnto his brethren. Again, we find that the vnaturall sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rauishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dims forcing: and by the iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar. That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Amalech, against whom this sentence was pronounced. Thou art but dead, because of the Woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans Wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp leede to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be faide, not onely to haue bene written in the hearts of men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarkes. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: to ouer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law: the Angels intuitiuelly; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetatiue powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Iudiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NOW as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restrain: so this Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know whatseuer the Law saith, it saith to them which are vnder the Law. When it is opposed, or differed from the Prophets and Psalms, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them; as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalms.

Rom. 3. 28.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

Rom. 6. 4.
Gal. 3. 18.

When it is opposed to Grace, it significeth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summius: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace.

John 1. 7.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it significeth but shadows and figures; as, The Law was given by Moyses, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ.

Gal. 3. 22.
Rom. 4. 6.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of *Christ*s comming, it significeth the whole polity of the Jewes Common-weale; as, Before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronical Priesthood; as, All the Prophets and the Law, or the Priests, prophesied unto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

Rom. 8. 2.
Gal. 3. 23.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the Law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of conscience, &c.

Levitic. 2. 10.

But then ritten Law of Moyses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moyses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse, and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the observers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For, according to S. Iames, whoever shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition stiled by the Schoolmen, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus given. Lex diuina est diuina decretum, humanis praescribens modum necessarium et apte peruenit perit ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quae est diuinae humanae uitae finis. The ancient Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing unto men a necessary meane, whereby they may gett attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

Rom. 7. 12.

The law of Moyses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth that which is good to be done, and thus or that euill to be avoided, in particular; as also it declarer, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commandeth it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for eternall worship, and the order of following our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular gouernment, fit for the Common wealth of the Jewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it laide of Saint Paul, the commandment is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the gouernment of the Common wealth of the Jewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beaſts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars, and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passeouer, and such like. For the Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beaſts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purifying, anointings, and attire, as not to weare mixt Garments of Linnen and Woollen: as also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Aſſe, or cast mingled seede in one field. It also exhorteth naturall compaſſion, and forbiddeh cruelty euen to beaſts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some reſerre theſe precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird ſitting on her neſt; nor beaſt downe the firſt buds of the tree, nor muzzle the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Neither is there any of theſe three parts of the Law of Moyses, but it hath as yet in ſome reſpects, the ſame power which it had before the comming of Chriſt. For the Morall lieth ſtill, and is not abrogated or taken away: ſauing in the ability of iuſtifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worſhip God: and to vie charitie

one towards another: which for euer ſhall be required at our hands. Therein alſo are we in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by ſpeciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth ſtill. For theſe things alſo are commanded in both Testaments to be obſerued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, & for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall alſo lieth in the things which it fore-ſignified. For the ſhadow is not deſtroyed, but perfected, when the body it ſelle is repreſented to vs. Beſides, it ſtil lieth, in that it giueth both inſtruction and teſtimony of Chriſt, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for ſome Ceremonies and Types of holy ſignification, which are ſtill expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before *Chriſt*s comming, and in a farre leſſe degree of neceſſity.

Laſtly, the Iudiciall lieth in ſubſtance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuerſall equity thereof.

But the Morall ſteth in the point of iuſtification, the Ceremoniall as touching the aſſe and externall obſeruation (becauſe Chriſt himſelfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were ſignes & ſhadows) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A propoſall of nine other points to be conſidered, with a touch of the ſine firſt.

As for that which remaineth in the generall conſideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into theſe nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maieſty of the Law-giner.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacie and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old & new Teſtament.
7. The end and vſe of the Law.
8. The ſenſe and vnderſtanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is ſufficiently proued by S. Paul, in theſe words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandement is holy, and iuſt, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforeſaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maieſty of the Law-giner is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues, and beings, ſo he onely gaue the Law, who could onely giue the end & reward promiſed, to wit, the ſaluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moſes immediately, but by the minitry of Angels: as it is ſaid, And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing this Law, is in three reſpects. Firſt, in that they were prepared: Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and diſſeuered: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promiſe made to Abraham. Prepared they were, becauſe they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were I-dolaters. A Nation apart and ſeuered they were, becauſe of Gods choice and election. Children of the promiſe they were, for the promiſe was made by God vnto Abraham and his ſeede: not vnto his ſeede, as to Eſau and Jacob, but to his ſeede, as to Jacob or Iſrael ſingularly, of whom Chriſt. Now to Abraham and his ſeede were the promiſes made: hec ſayth Gal. 3. 6. not to the ſeede, as ſpeaking of many, but to thy ſeede, as of one, which is Chriſt.

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Auguſtine: that it was about the middle time, betwene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the law of Nature continued from Adam to Moſes: the Law written in the Commandements receiued by Moſes in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptiſme of Iohn: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which ſhall continue to the worlds end. Other reaſons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The ſit conſideration is of the efficacie of this Law, the ſame being a diſpoſition to, or signe of our Iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteousnesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were finnes forgiven, who taketh away the finnes of the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weak; beggerly as containing no grace, weak as not able to forgive and iustifie. The blood of Goats and Bulles, and threatenings of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward foule. For if the law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

or

§. XI. Of the first point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

The Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way propofed for attaining to faluation: as the Olde by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing itselfe, or object and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and faluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament; which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witnesse. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the O.L. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and deliered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perihable: but the New was given in a promise of an euertlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocrypha, a Testament and Gospell for euer during.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and cheefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophet and Psalms are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and cheefe part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof. The word euangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward giuen to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. verse 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of faluation, as in Luce 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we vnderstand the foure Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2 Cor. 3. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Dan. 9. 2. computed in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Covenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteousnesse and iustification.

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Covenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde propofing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the faluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by obseruing the Law, an earthly Kingdome, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them as farre off, and beleued them; confessing that they were strangers and pilgrimes on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine: Omnino pauci veterem legem intelligunt, non attendentes

Gen. 11. 31.
Heb. 11. 13.
1 Cor. 13. 12.

tendentes per promissa terrena aterna promitti: Few (saith he) do vnderstand the old law: not attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus pacere in Siphon. cap. 1. Indus more pecorum corporalibus donis opibusque, ut Indus somnians; God would not feede the Indus as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves dreame. And this may be gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus, & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise, but in respect of the future to wit, the safety of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncaured for, which lieth cuer.

The agreement betwene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the Law, laide both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the Olde and New, are assured: the Fathers having eaten the same spirituall food, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the Law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercy and faluation: to which the Law serueth as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and faluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we feared the Law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteousnesse by workes, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law retrieth, the Gospell allureth, Moses accufeth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quae non sanat (saith Saint Augustine) sed quae agrotantes probat; The Law was giuen, not to helpe, but to discover sickness: and Saint Chrysostome, Data est lex, ut scilicet inueniret, non ut moribus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaereretur; The Law was giuen that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seeke out the physician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the law had condemned. And as Moses was but a seruant, and Christ a Son; so the great benefit was referred to be brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

§. XII. Of the rest of the points propofed.

The feuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteousnesse in our owne workes, we must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vmoft end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteousnesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, do not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteousnesse, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and cheefe end of the law, is as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our felues condemned and lost. For the law was deliuered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and prefigure, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to hold them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we must conformance our felues.

The sense and vnderstanding of the Law is double, littrell and spirituall: by the littrell we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall, the figures and mysticall fore-peakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being vntill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the

Crosse, came,

* Gen. 49. 10.

Crosse, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof the vail of the Temple rent asunder, noting that the ceremonial vailles and shadowes were now to be renoued, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise then that it had not power to condemn according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe severely commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessd. And herein David so much reioyced, as he preferred the obseruation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delatus sum, sicut in omnibus divitiis; I have been delighted in thy law, as in all manner of riches: And againe, The law of thy mouth is good for me above thousands of gold and silver. This is the loue of God (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heaven that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the Sea for us, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, even in thy mouth, & in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I have set before thee this day, life and death, good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou mayst live, &c. Neither is it faide in vaine in Saint Mathew. Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata. Who wil enter into life, keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohn, Sci quia mandatum eius vita eterna est; I know that his Commandement is life everlasting. And if this bee the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainly he is but a liar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mansability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our afflictions, and voluntarily loose them from the chains of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficultis and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) propoeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements, & his Commandements are not grieuous. 1. Iohn 2. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences; it is not hard for any man to indee, by what easie perswasions, we steale away from our owne power, as unwilling to vie against our pleading desires.

§. XIII. Of the seuerall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our default.

For by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby we are inticed to the breach of this precept? seeing every reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessity, that by this almighty Vnity, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for euery of them, Which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true. Omnia mala exempla bonis inijs orta sunt. All ill examples did spring and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Laetantius) the deuil crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant foules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if hee be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more worthless worthlesse then the most worthless of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more wilde prize and baser, then the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what do we thereby (saith the Wisdome of Solomon) but call to the weak for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assiste in our iournies of him that cannot go, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, bee more senselesse: David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, we are no way allured to this horrible disclaime of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euilasting sorrow, and hell dwelt in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the deuil brought vp among men, without all subtilty of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need, Adultery to lust, Oppression to conuentionesse: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly affections, so the most salvage Nations of the world do not vie it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the relation of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the summe of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The fifth of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom we are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God giues vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helpless infancy, and bestowed on vs the largest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, cursing of parents, or the offering of their violence, was made death.

Thenext is, that thou shalt not Murder, that is, thou shalt not do the actes following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affecto cum tua (saith Bracton) imponit nomen operi tuo; It is the affection and will that makes the work such as it is. And certainly, whosoever cannot forbear to commit murder, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vie of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginitie haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to the graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonor and iniurie, which we offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heate till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had bene vied in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speak not of the poore and miserable foules, whom hunger and extreme necessity inforceth, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkenesse, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impouerishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued, it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolute, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that incourageth these Hell-hounds. And if enery man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impoverish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness: from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth vs to couet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gaine. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our fraile affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For, though it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may reframe and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, & seeke for grace. How the word Coueting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscence, according to some, Est appetitus habendi appetitus, An unbridled, or unrestrained appetite of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any natural frailty, or vnadvised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for some vicing inclination thereunto. All the question is of the later sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus, ratione, quæ est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi; Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, it may seeme, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme vs not: as they say, Quando refragamus nihil nocent: nocent autem cum e dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not; and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to haue sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandment, not onely the outward acte, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For so euen the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandment forbidden, together with the outward acte: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandment, wee must needs say, that the euill desire of the Continent man (that is, euen those which wee resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridlith his euill desires, be much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a virtuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man do well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue the at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For as he saith, that in the Continent man the hauiing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a virtuous man: so we, that the hauiing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridlith them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeouours to keepe his commandments, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe: we may not safely giue liberty to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accused (saith Saint Hierome) that auowes that the Law is in all things possible to be observed: so he hath made this addition: Maledictum qui dicit impossibilia Deum precepisse; Accused is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weaknesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be understood, that we should without easiness, or without betraying of our selves, doe our faithfull endeouours to observe them: which if we doe vnfaidly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, David witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy sight no flesh that liueth shall be iustificed. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, Who can say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne greivous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or reframe himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no? For when a King giues to his subiect a commandment vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Soueraigne with shuffling excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

§. XIII.

If there were not any Religion nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be observed.

AND if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull providence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the observing, or not observing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes strue to observe these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeouours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enjoy the fruits of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts, of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of sauaiges. And hereof making our humane reason onely Iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and blood-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonie, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, metall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibility to receiue thence from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The observing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requieth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorne and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of mankinde would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe; This is my force: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeour by vertue and vnderaking to raise Families: murders and poysonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perishe, or or lineas the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man laboureth but to enioy the fruites thereof. And such is the mischeefe of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permit false witness, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would sweare against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle begger and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull laborer: all triall of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The courting of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but couet; and if we do attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wites or goods of our neighbours, we can look for no other, but that our felues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deprived of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there bee nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull & provident God ordaine them: without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnprofitable, and of no vse. For we should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approued by time: which Isidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores: to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae, to be customs approued by antiquity, or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from vse, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defective, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars; the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customs of Burgundie and Normandie: the ancient generall custome of England, & the customs of Cassili, and other Prouinces.

The second are these petty customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors. The generall or Nationall customs are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The customes of the Duchie of Cornwall comprehending also the Stannerie of Deuon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoeuer vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought

In Reg. Twit. 2. every custome to be rationabilis, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod desire ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded upon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Plinian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time amends not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defenses are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that euery custome which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, & therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue bene since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ouer-ruled in the law, Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui nouam legem, & nouam constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law: save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is only the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of praeique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduicement of wisemen, & the restraint restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calls the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall, and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercising publicke authority: prescribing necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying; Nihil lex esse non videtur, quia iusta non fuerit; It seems to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines deriuauerint.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to bee made by an authorized Magistracie, it cannot bee doubted, be the government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniqua constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are fourie properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Julia de Adulterij, alia Cornelia de Sicarij; The Law of Iulian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another.

Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Plinian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that diclate, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted betwene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptations, and diuers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a Species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Ciuile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe not agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Plinian, Ius ciuile, neque in totum a naturalis & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit; itaque cum aliquid addimus vel de iustitia iudicialium iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Ciuile efficitur; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome; and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as well out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Romane customes and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuised by the first Kings, and called Leges Regiae, or Papyrian, because they were gathered by Paprius, Tarquius then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished, a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, then the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Tibi soli peccauit, faith David; Against thee onely haue I sinned: therefore, the Prince cannot be faide to be subiect to the Law; Principes non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernatiue: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humane non pertinet; sed vis potestatis humane non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia actiua, est principium transfundendi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his owne power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the Law-maker himselfe: for every actiue ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes haue power to deliuer others from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Principes sine legislator sua se voluntate prohibita ab obligatione legis liberare; Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure deliuer himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate conditionis; 20 Principes vero sola voluntate sua, & intuitu boni communis. The subiects are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.

Now concerning the politique Lawes giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a Preident, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse; I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, that wee ought not to seeme wiser then God himselfe, who hath tolde us that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations haue their feuerall qualities, wherein they differ, euen from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disagreeable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeede containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued, and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or as Astrologers more willingly grant some influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Thieues) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo unhappily diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first embraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously then seasonably. In such cases, me thinks, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vnjust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the cuill, which forsch men, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vnouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wise and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required, euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiastick, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart

ff. de 1. p.

Greg. de P.

to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obscured by Master Doctor Willer, that the morall Iudiciall of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that wee are tyed to the same feuerity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the feuerity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heauy: for to shew more rigour then Moses, becommeth not the Gospell.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath bene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither wil I take vpon me, to speake any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes bene very plausible. And surely howeuer they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law; yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whercon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction, in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hercof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witness, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentle woman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other proofe, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being Conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistis was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) reueuouly lamented: but this Iudge, faith the same Authour, Scipius ipse mihi fassus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facti ois se purgaret; Ne himselfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphisiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proved, may iustly be granted by all other politique institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphisiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens; Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of being, the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdome. To which purpose well faith Saint Augustine, Conditor legum temporalium si uir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulti eternam, de qua nulli animo iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if hee be good, and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, to determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; No man can lay a better, or another foundation, then the Lord hath laide.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of Moses.

§. 1. Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the Wildernesse, with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

When Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary, he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing seene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age upwards; he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number of the whole Army was 603550. able men for the wars, besides women & children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Aegypt; This great Army was divided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Nasfon: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vanquing, and was the first that moued & marched, being lodged and quartered at their generall incampment on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joyning vnto it Simeon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simeon 59300. vnder Shelumiel: in Gad 45650. vnder Eliashaph: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joynd the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin, who, joynd together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elisbama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamlid: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidan.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were joynd the two Tribes of Nephthali and Ascher. And these had the Rearward, and moued last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abieser: Ascher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephthali 53400. vnder Abira.

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousandes, ouer Hundredes, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appeare by that mutinie and insurrection against Moses; Num. 16. v. 1. & 2. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Asseubly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renouue: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principal Mutiners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes, or Generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, took place not onely in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was obserued. For Judah had the precedency and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sonnes of Leah, Jacobs wife. Reuben hauing lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simeon, who had vndergone his Fathers curse, and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Issachar, who intemporal blessings had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments: the younger, according to Jacobs prophecy taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloued brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Jacobs Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Army, according to Jacobs prophecy. He had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Leah, or Rachel, but onely the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, sur-rounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of these foure powerfull Armies which guarded the same: so was it death for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were the terror of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the mouable Temple of God, and with such reuerence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions; the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people obserued the former order in their incampings: so did the Leuites quarter themselves, as in an inner square, on euery side of the Tabernacle; the Gershonites on the West, within the Armour, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Eliashaph commanded, in number 7500. The

The Family of Cohath on the South-side, guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betwene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, ouer whom Zurriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North-side, within the Army of Dan; On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall Families, was Elezazar the sonne of Aaron, his successeur in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching; the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuary, witnesse well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industry vsed in the flaming thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof, the curious workmanship theron bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemne remoring thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prouident defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this fine per age, by those of the Family, by the Antichrist, Brownist, and other Seclaries, as all cost and care bestowed had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Popey, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: inasmuch as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence again into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the hedges; and the Offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernment, left to new-mould of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancy with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of Revelation; inasmuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable then contrary to itselfe, the Faith of Men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distastion gaue a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran. Sime adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si nunc alijs adiungo, & vobis condemnor, quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others; If I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you: What I should anioide I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twelue Princes: the Possessor of the second yeere: The departing of Ictiuro.

NOW when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbred his Army, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged therunto: the Sanctuary excepted, which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershon and Merari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a Charger of fine siluer, weighing 130. sheekles; a silver Boll of 70. sheekles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of gold, often sheekles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards

The Hebrew Gershon weigheth 130. sheekles; the common Side is but halfe as much. To wit ten Gersh: as it is usually expounded; though Vilalpandus labours to prove that the common and the Sanctuary Side were all one, Num. 9. verse 5. Num. 10. 11. Exodus. 26. 34. Numbers 9. 17.

their

their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve silver Chargers, and twelve silver Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheekles of silver; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cuppes, to 120. sheekles of gold; which makes of sheekles of silver 1200. euery sheekle of gold valuing ten of silver, so that the whole of gold and silver which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all theret by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeere: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from about the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this invocation to God: Rise up Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Pitran, the Armie, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Naasson, taking the Vanguard, followed by Nathanael and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issachar and Zabulon; after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many deserts and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leaving nothing vnthought of which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their iourney towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderstanding & iudge-<sup>ment</sup> (as appeared by the Councell hee gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) so he was a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Atidan, or Atidan: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience, for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had lived 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of foules, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to vfe many guides, and many conducters. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Jethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from Moses into his owne Country. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that his returne to his owne Country, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Country, by letting things in order, then to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

AFTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel beganne to march towards the Deserts of Paran:<sup>50</sup> and after three dayes wandring, they laye downe at the Sepulchers of lust, afterward called Tubera, or Incensio: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutinies and Murmurers which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselves with Quiles (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Siman or Iune: whereof surfsating there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our Iuly, they went on to Hazerath, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seven dayes, after whose recovery Israel remoued toward the border of Idumaea; and incamped at Rithma,<sup>51</sup> neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discouersers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Country; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Riues, Fords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites surprized diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discouersers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discouersers of Cades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel, whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible Wildernes (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other then the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preserued them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites, or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Giant-like, (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anach) who were men of fearful stature, and so farre ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to themselves, but as Grasshoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, wherein they both accused God, and consulted to chooſe them a Captaine (or as they call it now adayes, an Electo) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished euery soule of the whole multitude (Iosua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumaea, which is but narrow; laying before them the fertility thereof, and assuring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayors of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and interposing the feare of his bright glory between the vnadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his seruants, perswaded them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which they had made, since God deliuered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so seuer a iudgement, how deservfully fouer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Deserts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breach of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heavy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity, so by the measure of his glory (euermore ialous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe vnpunished, reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preserue, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frustrated.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moses had revealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heavy displeasure towards them, they began to bewail themselves, though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings, they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moses; who assured them, that God was not among them; and that the Arke of his covenant should not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto benedicted and rebared, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: so the Hebrewes, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conducters offered; and might then haue entered Iudaea before their enemies were prepared and ioynted; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, vnder take the enterprise of themselves; and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumaea. There

the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioynted, and attending their aduantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuitt, consumed them all the way of their flight, euen vnto Hormah: the Amalekites in reuenge of their former losse, and ouerthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their dilapidation and destruction threatned. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioynted together for their common safety) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painefull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly travelled, till they found the banks of the red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came back to passe to ouer Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and oddethousand, which came out of Aegypt (Moses, Ishua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse; the stubborne and careless generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of the discouersers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermanded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry of worshipping Moloch, and the Host of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses, according to the commandment receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence he came, to recover the shores of the Red Sea. And so from Cades of Rishma he remoued to Reimmonparaz, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuid. d among them. From thence he went on to Lihnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Lihnah he crost the Valley, and came downe at Refsa, nere the foote of the mountaine. And after he had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclata, where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood onto the Sabbath, was fencd to death. After which, Moses alwayes keeping the Valley betweene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Sin; and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Sapler, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada; then to Macedab; and then to Thahab, and so to Thara or Thare, the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest mannailes and iudgements of God, that hath bene shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods, euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church and Common-wealth of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirmethem, it pleased him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelve rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelve Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of euery Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on euery rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aaron on 50 that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night, had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharah the whole Army remoued to Methra; and thence to Esmoa; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masuria, after Saint Hierome) and from Moseroth to Beniacan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgads; thence to Setabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a River, which falleth into the Red Sea, betweene Madian and Asiongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Asiongaber, where Salomon furnished his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great River in Arabia the stonie, which he calleth Corys, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leather to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia releued the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times hee is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Setabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Pannon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Deuteronomy the tenth, and the seauenth Perse, is also called Setabata, or Tobab, a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the River Zared, the next adioyning. And that these Springs should fall into the Red Sea, at Asiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Torrents of fresh water in those sandy parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thisty land, before they can recouer the banks of the Red Sea.

From Setabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hebron, and from thence to Esiongaber: which City in Iosephus time had the name of Beneice; and in Hieroms, Eflia. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded: Esiongaber, being the farthest place towards the South-East, that Moses traualled in that passage.

It seemeth that Esiongaber or Asiongaber, Eloth and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is saide, That the Lord spake vnto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Hor; nere the Coast of the Land of Edom; so as the Mount Hor was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esiongaber, and the other places nere the Red Sea, had at this present bene subiect vnto the Idumaeans. Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumaeans obtained those places: for it is saide; And they arose out of Madian, and came to Paran, and tooke men with them; which were those companies that followed young Aial of Idumaea, into Aegypt, when he fled from Iosh. Likewise it is saide of Salomon, that hee made a Nauy of shippes in Esiongaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

§. V.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esiongaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kadesh: or in Beroth, of the children of Isaac; where they laye downe in the first Moneth of the fortieth yeere, after they left Aegypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking end at Esiongaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or nere it, died Miriam or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From hence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen, by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the Earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, should preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in euery of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Lord promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of

Cc

God

Num. 20. 9.

God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end; he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rody; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satisfied. Neuertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the traualles of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was depoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but G O D received Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more seene.

Num. 33.

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwise Mosera, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites took name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mosera, which was the seauen and twentieth Mansion; and Mosera which they write Moseroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadeshbarne towards Ezionabab, encamped at Mosera, after hee departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Beniaman. And this Mosera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister dyed; the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mosera, it should haue bene written, Horiusta Mosera; Hor nere Mosera: for it is but one rooke of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mosera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as hee past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Araba, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, the Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that he might passe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neerest way of all other from the City of Kadesh, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwise taking his journey by the Riuer of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, hee might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riueres, the farre way about, and the many powerfull Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea herunto, Moses remembered him, that hee was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sonnes of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby, that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assist the Canaanites; against whom Esaue his Ancestor had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumaea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that hee would no way offend his people, or waste his Country, but that hee would retrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoever he used, yea, euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattell should drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Esaue. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his owne Country, the same being nere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountains: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entered his Country, it would rest in their willes to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible means. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Country together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the ende of his enterprife was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of natural vnderstanding the greatest of any man, & the skillfullest man of war that the world had, he refused fed to aduenture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gaue but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the feare of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendered them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. V. I.

Of their compassing Idumea, and travelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

10 E therefore leauing the way of Idumea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanced the way of Idumea, and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to find his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses bene infortified: hee haue made his way by the Sword through Idumea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolute to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Army, which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many herds of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was enuironed subiect to surpris. By which advantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance vnexpected, hee slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessor, which ioyned his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an overthrow to those mutinous Israelites, Num. 14. 45. which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entered Canaan from Cadeshbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are saide to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, nere Cadeshbarne, or if it were his Predecessor that then prevailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compass Moab, determined while he was yet in the Desert to tie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue bene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entered Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fitteth a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the Riueres of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and nere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Again, Horma (for so saue the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is so feared in the South of Iudea. There is also a City of that name in Simcon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time fitteth the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites took their reuenge, and after they had past Iordan: Iosua then gouerning them, who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his City Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plaines of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the biting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement let vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth between the Red Sea, and Cafiojoria, encamped at Zalmora: and thence he removed to Phunon, where he erected the Brazen Serpent, making their journey by the edge of Idumea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonseca) per viam quæ habet à latere mare rubrum; by the way that sided the Red Sea, but in deed they croft, and went athwart the common way from Galand, Trachonitis, and the Countreys of Moab, to the Red Sea, so that is, to Eziongeber, Elath, and Midiam: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to shunne the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, croft the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Thence he went to Oloth, where they entered the Territory of Moab, adjoining to the Land of Supha, a Country bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Ashrim, the eighth and thirtieth Mansion, that is, where the Mountains so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mounts of Hills, on the East border of Moab: From thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the River of Zared, which riseth in the mountains of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And having past that River, they lodged at Dibon Gad,<sup>30</sup> and from thence they kept the way to Diblahaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblahaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the River of Arnon, and encamped in the mountains of Ashrim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Helmondiblahaim, but speaketh of his remove from the River of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon, calling Arnon the border of Moab, betweene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Baiae Peor then reigning. From Diblahaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrey: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to give a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he undertooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, observed the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successors, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verse 10. in these words; When thou comest neere unto a City to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of and open unto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries unto thee, and serve thee; but if it refuse, &c. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies haue observed to this day, or ought to haue done.

§. VII.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Num. c.21. v.

Now concerning the Warre betweene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this Storie to that Booke entituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memorable, with greater breuity in this place. His words after the Geneva Translation are these: *Wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Rivers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob, and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneuian and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Suph, a Country bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcirco dici solent in recessione bellorum Ichoua, contra Vahebum in Regione Suph: & contra flumina, flumina Arnanis; Therefore it is spoken in repeating of the 10 battailes of Ichoua, against Vaheb in the Country of Suph: and against the Rivers, the Rivers of Arnon. In which words he rendereth, that amongst the warres which the Lord did*

20 posed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vabeh, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vabeh was the immediate predecessor of Balaac, who lived with Moses: though it be written that this Balaac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vabeh. For it seeme (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were cōtiguous, and not succellive. And as Iustin in this Translation vnderstandeth no special Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Valabius in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any special Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Booke of Judges. Syracides 4.6. tells vs plainly that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Iosua. Whow was there (saith he) before I came like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. But seeing the Histori-
 30 es of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable, that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Iezrael obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished
 30 in the long race of time, or haue been destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Hemoch, howeouer they haue been in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddaus, and cited by Origen the apostle, and by Tertullian.

Origin who origin, and by Tertullian.
That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others beflow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembred by Iosuae c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Iussur, or Iustorum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the middelt of the Heavens is recorded; and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also Dauid tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Inda, to exercise their bowes against 40 their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Preadefinition, in which the iust are written, according vnto the sixty and ninth psalme, Verse 28. where it is said; Let them be put out of the Booke of Life, neither let them be written with the righteous. Hierome thinke, that Dauid by this Booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the actes of the iust Abraham, of Iaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus; others, as Theodoretus, that it was a Commentary vpon Iosuae, by an vnknowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. go v. 18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Silonites, who met with Ieroboam; and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdom of Israell from the sonne of Salomon: as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Ieda the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. with these haue the bookes of Shee-zer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Iehoiach and of Iddo, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished: and that of Iehoiach the sonne of Hamaji; of the acts of Iehophaph, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 24. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hafcirim, of 5000. verses, ness of him, vnto whom in his prayers he commended them : He also commanded the Priests to lay vp the Booke of the Law, by the side of the Arke of God: The last that he indited was that Prophetickall Song, beginning : Hearken ye Heauens and I will speake, and let the Earth heare the words of my mouth : and being called by God from the labours and forrowes of this life, vnto that rest which neuer afterward hath disquiet, hee was buried in the Land of Moab, ouer against Beth-peor : but no man knoweth of his Sepulcher to this day, which happened in the yeere of the World 2554.

§. X.

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

NOW let vs a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundry of the great euent, which haue bene mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the medium of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall find that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increase of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the forrowes and losse, which befell himselfe, and the Aegyptian Nation : which numbers when hee fought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when hee commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharaohs owne daughter, to preserue that child, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation, euen then, when he fought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horles, and Chariots, to tread them vnder, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceived of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Aegyptian that offered it : the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to discouer the slaughter of the Aegyptian, moued him to flie into Midian : the contention betweene the Shepherds of that place, and Zelphas Daughters, made him knowne to their Father : who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters : and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Herd-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein hee first suffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised : and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his will and diuine pleasure for his returne into Aegypt. The like may be saide of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence : but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by : yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeeres after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their comming out of Aegypt; and of the Men of renowne in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Iosua, with the summe of the History of Ioshua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to haue Warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we looke to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their comming out of Aegypt, had to doe, either in the Wildernesse, or afterward : we shall find them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity : partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham : and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, and Ismaelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages : whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them : and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient injuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuinity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites : and so to serue for such purposes as God had referred them for. To make these things more manifest, wee must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East : by the way of Aegypt, and the Red Sea on the South : and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West, was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem : but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and Possessors of those Territories : by procelle of time diuided into severall Families and names : whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummims, or Zuzes, the Enims, Horites, and others. These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries : the rest were the Zidonians, Lebushites, Amorites, Henites, Heites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Country in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and strangers in that Country : especially the Israelites, and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them : no more then the Philistims did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them : especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan : yet now euen they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites : as holding them strangers and intruders : making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had linked themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre possit themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites and Ammonites : of Esau the Idumeans : of Madian the Madianites : of Ismael, the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue bene a Tribe of Edom, because Esau had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason conuinceth

Coloss. 1. 16. thura, was Priest or Prince of the Madianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Neece, Moses married: and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro if he were not the same with Hobab, must be his father: and this Hobab had seven daughters. He guided Moses in the Wildernesse: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Raguel's surname, of which Kenites was Heber, which had peace with Iabin the second, even now remembered.

Iud. 1. At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had through fears, and lived in the mountaines of the Deserts.

1 Sam. 15. 6. The Kings of the Canaanites, and Madianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Hevite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Baan
5. Adonizedek the Iebusite, King of Hierusalem
6. Hobab of Hebron
7. Piram of Iarmuth
8. Lapia of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Iabin of Ilazor
11. Iobab of Modon
12. Adonizedek of Bezek, and
13. Iabin the second King of Ilazor.

Of the Madianites these:

• Eui or Enis.

Rekamor or Rekem who built Petra the Metropolis of Petrea, so called by the Greekes: and by Esai, cap. 16, verse 1, and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called 2 Reg. 14. 7. where it is also called Iokiteel.

- Zur*
Hur and
Reba
Oreb
Zeb
Zebah
Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, Judges of Israel, the four last named of these Madianite Kings, vexed Israel seven yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and slain by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Jordan, as in the 6, 7, and 8, of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himselfe laid hands upon Zebah and Salmuna, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners: in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000 of the Madianites and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

Gen. 17. 10. Iud. c. 7. F the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named, and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according unto the promise of God made unto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Madianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul governed Israel. For Saul pursued them from Sur unto Hanilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petrea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelve Princes which came of Ismael, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petrea, called Sur, Paran, and Sim, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue beene, and so were the Madianites) themselves taking possession of a better soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petrea. For Nabath the eldest of those twelve Princes planted that part of Arabia Petrea, which was very fruitful though adioyning to the Desert, in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabathia: the same which neighbourth Iudea on the East-side. They also peopled a Province in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after-times called Napathai (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gave his owne name to the East-part of Baan, or Batanea, which was afterward possessed by Masasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountaines Traconi, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, and Plinie carans. Abbel fare downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gave name to the Adubens, which Ptolomy calleth Azubens.

Misam was the Parent of the Masamancuses, neere the Mountain Zamath, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Raubens were of Misima: who ioyned to the Orchems, neere the Arabian galle, where Ptolomy setteth Zagmas.

Of Duma were the Dumans, betwene the Adubens and Raubens: where the City Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athritia, who bordered the Napathians in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the City of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Iuraens, or Chamathens: of whom Tohu was King in Dauid's time.

Of Naphri the Nubeian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adadnecer commanded, while Dauid ruled Israel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmoeneans: who were afterward called Assire: because they worshipped the fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Agyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Asar, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when Esai. 17. of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadeshbarne.

After the government of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Madianites: and invaded Israel. God commanded that as soone as Israel had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Agypt, to the border of Chaldea: from Hanilah to Shur.

In Dauid's time they tooke Siklag in Simcon: but Dauid followed them, and surpris'd them, recouering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumza were wasted and displaced by Chiron the children of Simcon.

§. IIII.

Of the insauration of ciuility in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

Here, liued at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuility (bred and fostered fare off in the East, and in Agypt) begin at this time to discover a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudea. For if Pelasgus besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raine and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who before liued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsely those Nations haue vaunted of those their antiquities accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both Ensebius and Saint Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: Quem propterea serunt deluto formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse perhibetur, Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Again, it is written of him, that he had the art to vntie this fire, as thereby he gaue life to Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing else worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, to being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies, for so it is saide: Idem altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno caelo quam longissime astra, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret. That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discern afaire off the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diuersly.

Of this Mans knowledge Aeschylus giues this testimonie.

Africanus makes Prometheus faire more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Phrygius saies that he liued at once with Nachus, who liued with Isaac. There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it be saide, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Iapetus, Aeschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Heperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Evening, and so to the evening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Libya or Mauritania, there were others, which bare the same name: but of the Libyan, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sus, and Hek, with the Sea adioyning tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions, affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas, were but by those haies to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec verò Atlas sustinere caelum, nec Prometheus affixum Caucasus, nec stellatum Cepheus cum uxore traditur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabula traduxisset; Neither should Atlas be saide to beare up heauen, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be stelled, vnlesse their diuine knowledge had raised vpon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Saturnus, as Rheus comix alme Promethen. But that the story of Promethius was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Ensebius and Saint Augustine haue not doubted; For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleides and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archeus the sonne of Orichonemus challengeth the inuention. Of this Archeus Arceus in Peleponnesus tooke name; and therefore do the Arceadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone. Et Luna gens Arceadians fuit: which is to be vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isacius Tzetzes, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Libya: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequall and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesius, as it is saide, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V. Of Deucalion and Phæton.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the sonne of Promethius, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for mother; the rest Chymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odyssees, makes Deucalion the sonne of Minos: but he must needs haue meant some other Deucalion, for else either Ulysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Ulysses after his returne from Troy, fained himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but once before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Promethius, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect euery foule in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrria his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villanie: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule finnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all mankind drew on them that generall destruction by the flood vniuersall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrria his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

*Non illa melior quisquam, nec amantior aequi
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior illa deorum.*

No man was better, nor more iust than hee:
Nor any woman godlier than these.

It is also affirmed that Promethius fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to prouide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cibotium; and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Story had bene but an imitation of Noahs flood deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellen of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melantho, on whom Neptune is saide to haue begotten Delphus, which gaue name to Delphos, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phæton; not onely in Ethiopia, but in Iliria, a Region in Italie, and about Coma, and the Mountaines of Resunius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BVt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter maximus; and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine & Lactantius find it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, and Sea-men, and the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many workes some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Aegypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Aegyptians feared to utter, as the Jewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Aegypt, is said to have deliuered literature to the Aegyptians, and to have given them Lawes. But Diadorm affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Aegypt to Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying: That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Themet; whom Philosophus writeth Taautus, the Aegyptians Thoth, the Alexandrians Thot, and the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taautus, Sanchoiastho, who liued about the warre of Troy, giues the invention of letters. But Saint Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Aegyptians, calles neither of them the sonne of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to have flaine Argus. For he finds this Mercury, the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vines vpon Saint Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembred. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercury brought letters into Aegypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquity) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Aegypt or Phenicia; and not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Aegypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Bæotia, either out of Aegypt, or out of Phenicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses, and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argines, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthemelus, who reigned cleuen yeeres; after him Danaus fifty yeeres; after him Lyncæus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arrived in Bæotia. And therefore it cannot be true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Aegypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Aegypt, whom Saint Augustine remembreth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vse of them to the Jewes; of whom the Phenicians their Neighbors receiued them; and the Greekes of the Phenicians by Cadmus. But this invention was also ascribed to Moses, for the reason before remembred; that is, because the Jewes and the Phenicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose workes hee Commenteth, to haue bene foure descents after Moses; which he hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diadorm, call the Counsailler and Instructer of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus sheweth no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diuine the first Sculus affirmeth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vines vpon the fixe and twentieth Chapter of the eighth Booke of Saint Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei, conceiuet, that this Mercury, whose workes are extant, was not the first which was entituled, Ter maximus, but his Nephew or grand-child. Sanchoiastho, an ancient Phenician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; affirming that he was the Scribe of Saurne, and called by the Phenicians, Taautus; and by the Aegyptians Thoth, or Thoti. It may be, that the many yeeres which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres; gaue occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those which haue collected the grounds of the Aegyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses: because the Inuentor of the Aegyptian Wisedome, wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurie or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in manie particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the aprouing of Images, which Moses of all things most detested; yet whosoever shall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolute, that these workes which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Aegyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and Spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrarie in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt (Moses excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto almighty God, than he hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had bene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not bene perilous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Aegyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurie, which others haue thought to haue bene Ioseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaohs dreames, they called Saphanet phane, which is as much to say, as absconditorum repertor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Immie & aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scriptis libros, & quidem multos, ad comitandum diuinum verum pertinentes, in quibus Maiestatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, & quædam nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec habet written many bookes belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which hee affirmeth the Maiezie of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee do. The same Father also seareth not to number him among the Sybils and Prophets. And so contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Aegyptians and Græcians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatsoever is found in him contrary therunto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deus omnium Dominus, & Pater, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & Spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eis est prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & epifex, &c. God (saith hee) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine and life, and power, and light, and minde, and Spirit: and all things are in him and vnder him. For his Word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generatiue, and operative, falling vpon fraisfull nature, made it also fraisfull and producing. And hee was therefore (saith Suidas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate unum esse Deum asserens; Because hee spake of the Trinitie, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie. Hic rursus (saith Ficinus) prauis priscæ Religionis, hic ortum nouæ fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem seculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This Mercurie foretold the ruine of the olde or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will onely adde his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Suidas. Hæcenus filius pulvis & patria, rixi peregrinus & exul, nunc incolumis repeto: cumq; post paulum à robis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote me quasi mortuum iugatu: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Ciuitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersos replei sanitate mirifica: ad quam hæc, quam multi vitam existimant, mors est potius dicenda quam vita, Hitherto, O Sonne, being driuen from my Country, I haue liued a stranger and banished man: but now I am repairing home-ward againe in safety. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that you doe not beuaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the onely God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with a sweetest more then image, doubtlesse, no wise man will dare to fashion out unto the likenes of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected unto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdom, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; and was mighty in his works and words; the same is collected (how truly I know not) by Diogenes, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus, Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Cæsariensis, and diuided into four parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguish'd into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick; the ancient Egyptians exceeded all others. For Geometrie which is by interpretation, measuring of grounds, was vsfull vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Countrey being a lencell and square, Planes, free and cleere from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studie'd; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farther knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdom, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies and liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe; that all Starres haue a certaine foate heat, and temperate influences, wherby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and bee from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper foates, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdom, which is called Theologie, teacheth and becometh that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Egypt partly by means of the temperance of that Countrey, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertilitye, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortall, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not knowne; that many of the Gods haue bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefits bestowed on mankind, haue bene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they prevailed ouer their enemies. Moreover, the Egyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clem. Strab. §. Clemens distributeth the whole summe of this later Egyptian learning into three seuerall sorts, viz. Epistolary, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Sacerdotal, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred; which Sacred containeth Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which is expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figuratiue words; as for example, where it is written: The Ibis by the Horne participeth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropicall, and Ænigmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropicall or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Horne signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibis signifieth the Moone: by by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skillfulness; by a Lyon, Fortitude; by a Horse, Liberty; by a Crocodile, Impudency; by a Fish, Hatred is to be vnderstood: Ænigmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lyons body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all diuine things are Ænigmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sunne set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sunne nourisheth Meteors in the Ayre, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top whereof is made an Eye, and an Ear, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and Governing all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Pherecides Syrus reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine and destruction of his Kingdome, vnlesse he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthura returned to him a Moule, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Plough-share: which Orontopagas, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the moule, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their lands: were signified to be ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodes made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creepe into holes as a moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues, Till his grounds. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus deuised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Pimander and Aclepius, hath written fo many things of God, worthy of admiration, aswell (saith Sextus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus and Metastus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inuentor of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called, the Wisdom of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that subiect 36525 Bookes, or Pages. Of which there were numbred, of Fiey Spirits, one hundred Bookes; of Awfull Spirites as many, and of Spirites Celestiall a thousand, which because they were out of the Egyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Greeke, they seemed to haue bene first written in that Tongue. Clemens Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdom of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physicke sixe bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrology foure.

6. VIII.

A Brieue of the History of Iosua; and of the space betwene him and Orthoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Iosua: and of the breach of Faith.

After the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egression, in the first month called Nisan, or March, Iosua the sonne of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdom, tooke on him the government of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Jordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosua's rule Saint Augustine dates with the reigne of Amyntas, the eighteenth King in Assyria; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicionia, when Darius gouerned the Argives; and Erichonius, Athens.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Jordan certaine discouersers to view the feate and strength of Ierico, the next City vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which he was to passe ouer. Which discouersers being faued, and sent backe by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because shee kept a Tauerne or Vitling-houle, made Iosua know that the Inhabitants of Ierico, and those of the Countrey about it, hearing of the approach not in this case the helpe of Aquiuocation, or Mentall Reservation. For what hee sweare, he sweare in good Faith; but he sweare nothing nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises he made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuoluable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse mentake it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societe, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it be broken) is broken to a man, to a Societe, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at nought and despise him. If hee that without Reservation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promisseth in his name, and makes him a witnesse of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400. yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people defended of the Gibeonites; yet God who forgat not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seuen of Sauls sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieued, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to refuse in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vallalls to their Lords, of Wiues to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trialls of right, will not onely be made vnertaine, but all the chaines, whereby free men are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that wee enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witnesse, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised: I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the severity of Gods Commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whose euer hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holie Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Agypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holie Land it selfe: by reason (saith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Almerick the fifth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadach, and his Vicegerent, The Souldan Sanar; who being suddenly inuaded by Almerick, drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after hee had made Agypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holie Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon. And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies, shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, shall be the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lye? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungaria after his great victory ouer Amurath the Turk; and when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet hee lost the battaile with 30000. Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; begit against Infidels, Turkes, or Christians of diuers Religions. Launtable it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-daies, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by fore-seeing their Idolatries, and as it is said in the Scriptures, To be Thorns in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make Warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not onely remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death, the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countreies, and enforst to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of handell-accessible. And those of Iuda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Iudges, The Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines as Azzab, Gath, Asdod; yout of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Iordan expell the Geshunites, nor the Manachites; which inhabited the North parts of Basam, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Xaphalims possesse the midlues of Bethislemish; nor of Bethanah; but they ynforsed those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athob, Achab; Hethlah, Aphike, and Rebsh, nor enforce them to tribute.

Nor were could Zabulon enioy Kitron, and Nahol, but received tribute from them. Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gazer among the Ephraims; and among the children of Manasse, on the West of Iordan, the Canaanites held Bethshean, Taanach, Dor, Ikham, and Atad; yet Thersalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend about foure hundred yeeres, euen till Dauid time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, eightene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not exprest in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fixe and twentie yeeres, Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie: And Masseus fixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Stephus, fourteene: Iouanes Lucidus, seuentene: Clauius, ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen & twentie: and so doth S. Augustine: Melanchthon, two and thirtie: Cadoman, fixe and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliuerie of Israel out of Agypt, vnto the building of the Temple, it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eightene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approved opinion.

The time necessitie of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Agypt vnto the building of the Temple, continueth of error, such as haue inferted yeeres betweene Iosua and Othaniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeeres, to which Arius Montanus adhereth; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapter vpon Iosua: Bunting reckons it nine yeeres: Bucholzer and Resner but one, Cadoman twentie, and Nicephorus no lesse than three and thirtie: whereas following the fixe direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betweene Iosua and Othaniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eightene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayles and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclesiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter, v. 26. And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the law of God: which seemeth rather to haue beene meant by the couenent which Iosua made with Israel in Shechem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law: and of this opinion were Clauius and Ablensis: Theodoret doth likewise conceiue that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intituled Liber Iustorum, remembered by Iosua himselfe, and others, that it was the work of Samuel: for whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it, for when the people had answered Iosua; The Lord our God wil we serue, & his voice will we obey, it followeth that Iosua made a couenent with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There lived at once with Iofus, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beasts together, thereby to till the ground with more ease and speed : And about the same time the fiftie Daughters of Danaius (as it is said) flew the ficed Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyncus who succeeded Danaius, if the tale be true. There lived also with Iofus, Phenix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iofus life, Iupiter is said to have rauified Europa the Daughter of Phenix, (afterward married to Asterius King of Creta) and began on her Minos, Radamantius, and Sarpedon. But S. Auguftine reports this rauiffment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sonnes of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perfon a young or strong man at the fame Troian war. And fo doth Neflor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Thelcus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of ages paft : Minos being yet more ancient than any of thefe. But hereof elfewhere.

Of the Tribes of Ifrael, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with fundrye Stories depending upon thofe places.

6. I.

The Proæme to the description of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Exposition of the name of Syria.

TH E storie of the Indes ought to follow that of Iosua, after which the Common-wealth of the Iemes was gouerned by Kings, of which lo many of them as ruled the tenne Tribes, shall be remembred when we come to the description of Samarra: but because the Land of Canaan, & the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whercon the greatest part of the Story pass, with that which followeth, hath been acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderstanding of both) to make a Geographical description of those Regions: that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderstood, and conceiued. To which purpose (besides the addition of the Neighbour Countries) I haue bestowed on euery Tribe his proportion: and doe shew what Cities and Places of strength were by the Iemes obtained: and what numbers it pleased God to leaue vnc conquered; by whom he might correct and scourge them, when vngreatfull for his many graces, they at sundry times forgat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thole deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen.

Diuina bonitas (saith Augustine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc seculo, ne irascatur in futuro: & misericorditer temporalem adhibet seueritatem, ne aeternam iuste inferat ultionem: The Diuine goodnesse is especially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully vse temporal seuerity, that it may not iustly bring vs eternal vengeance.

to the Cities herein described, I have added a short Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-weales : and to helpe my selfe herein, I haue perused diuers of the best Authors vpon this subiect : among whom, because I finde so great disagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in such cases aduentured to follow mine owne reason, than to borrow any one of their old patternes.

And because Canaan, with Palestina of the Philistims, and the Lands of Og and Sihon Kings of Basan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but small Prouinces of Syria: it shall be necessarie, first to diuide and bound the generall, and so to descend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soré, according to the largest description, and as it was anciently taken, imbraced all those Regions from the Euxine Sea to the Red Sea: and therefore were the Cappadocians, which looke into Pontus, called Leucosyrians, or white Syrians. But taking it shorter, shorter, and from the coast of Cilicia, which is the North border, unto Idumea towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunrising, and the Mediterranean Sea Westward : it then contained besides Babylonia, Chaldea, Arabia the Desert, and Arabia Petraea, that Region also which the Greeks call Mesopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Rivers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for so Aram Nabairaym is expounded: also Padan Aram: that is, Padan Aram, because the two Rivers goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Jugum Syriae, because the two Kuirs goe along in it as it wick into Agave.
Edessa, sometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many small Provinces, as Calefrya which the Latines call Syria triana, because it lay in that fruitfull Valley between the Mountaines of Libanus and An- 10 tilyanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were seated. Then Damascena or Syria Lybaniæ, taking name of the Citie Damascus, and the Mountaines of Libanus, the Regall feate of the Adades, the first Kings of Syria. Ad 15 Adades was the Province of Sephene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobal, over which Adadeser commanded in Salomon's time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syphacianæ, as 20 laffy Syria Palesina bordering Agypt: of which Ptolomie maketh Judæa also a part: and Arabia, 25 Arabia Deserta, to that Province which Moses calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Melagiu the name of 30 Syria Indica.

§. II.

§. 11.
Of the bounds of the land of Canaan, and of the promises touching this Land.

BY that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phenicia; and stretcheth from behinde Tybanus to the great Deserts betwene Iudaea and Aegypt: bounded by the Mid-Land Sea on the West, and the Mountaines of Hermion; Galaad and Arnon towards the East: the same Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Traconitis; and Ptolomee Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Sinab. Lxx. namely the Sonne of Cham; et lingua appellata fuit Canaan. The language was also called Canaan; the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Angelinus. But Arius Montanus nam'd him well following the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arius Montanus nam'd him well following the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Augustine. But Arius Montanus nam'd him well following the Sonne of Sale, according to S. Augustine.

So the derivation, makes it a common name to all those of Noah's Sonnes, which pass'd over Euphrates towards the West Sea. For the word Heber, saith hee; is as much as transiens or transmittens; of going or passing over. And because the children of Abraham had for a long time no certain abiding: therefore as he thinks, they were by the Aegyptians called Hebraei; as it were passengers; which is also the opinion of C. Sigonius; and of Eusebius long before them both. It had also the name of Iudea from Juda; and thence afterwards intuled The holy Land, because therein our Saviour Christ was borne and lived. Now this part of Syria was againe divided into foure; namely, into Edom; (where wife Seir, or Edumaea) Galilee, Samarita, and Iudea. Galilee is double, the superior called Genium, and the inferior; and that Galilee and Iudea are distinguished, it is plain in the Evangelists, though both of them belong to Phenicia.

In A. D. m. lxxxviii. both which the River of

Now besides these provinces of Phœnicia, and Palestina (both which the River of Jordan boundeth; seeing that Phœnicia stretcheth a little more Easterly towards Damascus) that part also to the East of Jordan, and within the Mountains of Hermion Gilead, and Arnon, otherwise Traceni, fell to the possession of half Manasse, Gad, and Reuben; and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan also: as well because anciently possit by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enjoyed by the Israelites, which E. l. most parts are againe divided into Busan or Batanes, into Gilead, Manab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Macbati, Geffuri, Argobe, Hus. They are knowento the latter Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall: and by the names of Tracomiä, Pierin, &c.

But where Moses describeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genesis, he maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Mansse, Gad, and Reuben; for these he holds words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon, as thou comest to Gerar untill Anah (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Country North and South: then it followeth in the Text; And as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Seboim, euen vnto Lufat: by which words Moses setteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Deuteronomie it seemeth to be far more large: for it is therein written; All the places wherem the sole of your feet shall tread, shall be yours: Deut. 34. 4 your coast shall be from the wilderness and from Libanon, and from the River Perah, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrey North and South, this description agreeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the Wilderness for Gerar and Azab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perah be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both ouer Arabia Petraea, and the Desert as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possesse, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Vadianus doth conceiue thereby the River Perah, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to be an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea Westward.

Iosua.

And though it be true that Dauid greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holie Land: yet as Vadianus well noteth, if Perah in the former place be taken for Euphrates, then was it put per gentes in amicitiam receptas. For Dauid did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babilonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countreies giue aduantage to those that would make any irreligious cauill, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish Gods they themselves also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the letting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heu-Deut. 11. 24.
ren were above the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verbes preceeding, and subsequent; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other then all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuer in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eight Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomie, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperitie of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye Deut. 11.
keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possesse the Land, whither ye goe to possesse it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swaie vnto your Fathers, &c.

Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heauens were above the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, saith hee, all these commandements, which I command you to doe, that ye, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possesse great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Maestie, to the Idolatrie of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Melancthon: For, saith hee, Ostendit promissionem precipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; Ihesuethat his chiefe promise is not of a ciuill Kingdome. To which agrees that answer, which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome that he ouerthrew the reputation of the Iewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it together into an Allegorie, and ad illam duntaxat viuentium terram que in celis est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the liuing which is in Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudinem habeat 160. miliarium, latitudinem vero 40. & in his etiam regiones, loca, vrbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam a Iudeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Iewes is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreies, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Iewes neuer possesse, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father spea-
Cyp. 4. 14.
keth vpon I say touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De quo discimus Hierusalem nequaquam in Palaestina Regione petendam: quoniam Prouincia determinata est: & saxosis montibus asperatur, & paucorum patitur situs: ita vix cultibus rotatur pluuij, & rariualem fontium cisternarum extructione foletur: sed in Dei manibus adam quam dicitur seculumauerunt structores eius; From whence, saith hee, we learne, that Hierusalem is not to be sought in that region of Palaestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, stragled with with craggy Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it prefermeth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of Wells by building of Cisternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, to which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg, hoc dico in suggestionem terra Iudae, ut Hereticus Sycephanta mentitur: aut quo auferam historie veritatem: qua fundamentum est intelligentie spiritualis, sed ut decutiam supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagoga angustius latitudinis Ecclesie preferunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum quiescentem: ostendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neither (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudaea (as the Hereticall Iosephus doth belie me) or to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spiritual vnderstanding, but to beat down the pride of the Iewes: which enlarge the straits of the Synagogue farther then the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honie.

By this it may also be gathered, howfoeuer it be vnlike (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the littell fence, that Euphrates or Perah, which is made the East bound, should be taken onely in a spiritual fence) yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perah were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates: and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because Asher, Nephthaim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phoenicia, I will begin with these three, taking Asher for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to bee mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly exprest, so that to the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuersitie (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined others vowels then now the Hebrew editions haue; and partly because the Ancient exprest or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

He Asherites descended of Asher the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes at the time, when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the Riuer of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phoenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolemais Acon along the Sea-coast: containing thirte English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though An-tenius makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitful, abounding in Wine, Oile, and Wheate, besides the Balsamum, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning Asher, his Gen. 49: bread shall be fat: And he shall give pleasures for a King.

†. II.

Of Zidon.

The first City Remed on the North border of the Territorie of Asher, was Zidon, which Ioseph calleth the great Zidon, both for strength and magnitude. The Greekes and

2. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustine deriues the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Iosua, and Iosephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sonnes: and so strong it was in Iosua's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Assyrians, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, euen vnto the coming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably governed, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets Esay, Hieremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies abroad, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wash of the Phœnician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterranean or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the Riuer Leontis and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, in Strabo's time; but Adrianus sonnes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth Wessling in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two known Cities, as all the rest, make it ouer-difficult to deuse any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to be more ancient then Tyre; which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, to did it in all other Mechanical Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wise Zidonians. The Citie was both by Nature & Art exceeding strong, hauing a Caste or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Caste it hath on the South side by the Port of Agaza, which the Templers guarded. It also sent many other Colonies betwene that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephrya, Cities of Æthiopia in Greece.

Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the invention of "Glasse", which they vsed to make of those kinds which are taken out of the Riuer Belus, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, neere Ptolomis or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasse which they make at Murano: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon in insigne artifice: Zidon uirarij officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glasse-maker, or a skillfull worker in Glasse-houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Pineda gathers out of 1. Sam. 31. 10. and Jud. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appeares 1. Kings 11. 5. in the storie of Salomon's Idolatrie: where Astarte is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story thereof, the daughter of Archab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee many ying Iezabel the daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal, Diuers Baals & diuers Astartes. The name of Astarte in their Idolatrie they acknowledged: as it appeares by the plural names of Baalim and Astartim, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euen the name Astarte, as I am informed to haue beene a Septuagint word, is plural: the singular being Astarte: whence Jud. 2. 13. the word Septuagint reads Septuagint They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this their number being multiplying of their Baals, and Astartes, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the diuers stories depending vpon them: which (as fables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Augustine quest. 19. in Iudg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astarte. Tullie, lib. 3. de Nat. Deorum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to be Astarte: whom hee makes to be borne of Tyris and Syria, and to haue bene the Wife of Adonis: as also Admiror, 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great eneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom thereto the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Grecians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel did not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was famous in the Ægyptian Idolatry, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride, that Osiris with the Ægyptians is called Amnuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever these Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Jewes: who had bene taught by Moses and the Prophets for many yeeres, whereof our Satiour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to the Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had bene done in Tyris and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyris and Zidon, at the day of iudgement, than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Baldwinus the first, then King of Ierusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwales, who came with a Fleet to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recovered, the commandement thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And again in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lodowicke the French King: while he spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turkes, and hath the name of Zai.

t. III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew Sarphat, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the Riuer called Naar, or Fons hortorum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna,
Quæq; Sareptano palmite missa bibas.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for thy drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Sephet, saith Posselius.

Not farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of ships commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterranean Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatness and power, the Tyrians erected Utica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Vrbs antiqua fuit, Tyrij tenuere Coloni, Carthago. In Carthage was therefore called Punica quæst Phœnicum, a Colonie of the Phœnicians. In Spain they founded Gades, now Cádiz. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos. Asiaticus, which City the Scholast of Apollonius placeth neere the Riuer Phyllis, in Bythynia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Iosua the 19. taking name from the situation, because built on a high Rocke, sharpe at one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra, for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Ostrum Sarvanum, by which name Iuuenal and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high Hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day: the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet Esay

Eſay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon, which Tragus also confirmeth, though Heraſus by affinity of name makes Thir as the ſonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (ſo ſo much the Prophet Eſay ſo witneſſeth, Is not this your glorious City, whoſe antiquity is of ancient dayes?) yet, that Thir as the ſonne of Iaphet ſet himſelf in the boſome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I ſee nothing to perſwade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times ſo renowned, ſeemeth to be the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius, and Joſephus, and Eusebius make this Tyre elder than Solomons Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyrus the wife of Agenor gave it her name: but of Agenor I will ſpeake more at large in the ſtory of their Kings.

For ſtrength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receive Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Iland, 700. paces from the continent: and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midſt of the Sea, as ſome read, or as others in the inner-moſt part of the Sea, whence hee calleth it ſituate at the entry of the Sea, as also the ſame Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Eſay a Mart of the Nations: and ſo Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Eſay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in lea-ning, and in manu-facture: eſpecially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, ſaith Julius Pollux, was firſt found out by Hercules Dogge, who paſſing along the Sea-coſt, and eating of the Fiſh Canchili or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worſhipped the ſame Idols that Zidon did: ſaith that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrans preſented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, deſiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a ſacrifice to Hercules, the Deſender of their City, and the Anceſtor of the Macedonians Kings: and muſt therefore enter it. Whereupon they ſent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony: but this availed not. For Alexander was not ſo ſuperſtitious, as ambitious; he deſired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ſhips as he could, and brought from Tibarus ſo great a number of Cedars, and ſo many weighty ſtones, from the old City of Tyre adjoyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often waſte away with the ſtrength of the Sea and the Tides, yet he neuer reſted, till hee had made a ſoore paſſage from the Continent to the Iland: and hauing once approached their Walles, he ouer-topped them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent moving Spirit of reſolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that reſiſted, after which he cauſed 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongſt the Sea ſhore: which execution vpon cold blood he performed (as ſome Authours affirme) vpon the iſſues of thoſe ſlaues which had formerly ſlaine all their Maſters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Government to themſelves. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrans, Joſephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat reuolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. ſouldiers: who was the laſt Satrapa or Prouinciall Governour, which Darius ſeated in Samaria: the ſame who hauing married his Daughter to Manaſſe, brother to Taddus the high Prieſt of Hieruſalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Gabrisam ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Tewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Prieſthood he beſtowed on his ſon in law Manaſſe, whom the Tewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander beſieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius ſo calleth Sanabala, died.

Long before this deſolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanaſſer the Aſſyrian King: when the growing pride of the Aſſyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the reſt of Syria, became enuious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He beſieged it both on the Land ſide, and with threeſcore ſhippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any ſupply of men might enter it: but the Tyrans with twelve ſaile ſcattered that ſeete, andooke 500. priſoners of the Aſſyrians: notwithstanding the Aſſyrian continued his reſolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants ſine yeeres, but with ill ſucceſſe. And this ſiege Menander Euphratus, cited by Joſephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrans (which the ſaide Menander conuerted into Greeke) adding, that the Elamites whom Tyrus calleth Heſiſaus, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the ſame ſix and twenty yeeres. Soone after this reſulte of Salmanaſſar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at ſuch times as hee deſtroyed Hieruſalem before the Temple, came before this City: who indeede gaue to Alexander the example of that deſpairefull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the ſtrength of the Sea, the ſame caſtway and paſſage was againe broken downe, and demoliſhed.

Againſt Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrans defended themſelves: for ſo long did the Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every ſhoolder made bare, ſaith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Eſay had maniſtly foretold the deſtruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres ſiege or more, the Tyrans deſpoiled of all their hopes, and remembering ouer late the predictions and threatenings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a conuenient number of ſhippes, abandoned their City, tranſporting with themſelves the ableſt of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches ſayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: ſo as the Babylonians finding nothing therein, either to ſatiſfie ſo many labours and perils, or any perſon vpon whom to auenge themſelves for the loſſe of ſo many bodies in that Warre: It pleaſed God in recompence thereof (who ſtrengthened this reſolution, as in a worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Agyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the ſpoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaueſt not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrwarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happineſſe reſerued for his Seruants and Saints: yet ſuch is the boundleſſe goodneſſe of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall bleſſings.

Now of this enterpriſe of Nabuchodonosor againſt Tyre, prophane Hiſtorians haue not bene ſilent. For both Dioctes, and Philoſtratus (as Joſephus citeth them) the one in his ſecond Booke, the other in his Phenician Hiſtorie, remember it.

After theſe two great Viſitations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recovered it ſelfe againe: and continued in great glory about 300. yeeres, vnto the coming of our Saviour Chriſt; and after him flouriſhed in the Chriſtian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbiſhop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hieruſalem onely, who within his owne Dioceſſe and fourteene great Cities, with their Biſhops and Suffragans: namely Caſpha, otherwiſe Porphiria, Acon, or Ptolemais, Sarepta, Zidon, Caſarea Philippi, Berytus, Byblus, Botrys, Orthoſia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus (or Torioſa) and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the reſt of that beautifull Region of Phenicia and Paleſtina, ſubiected to the cruell and faithleſſe Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whole tyranny it ſuffered with the other Paleſtine Cities 488. yeeres.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hieruſalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Gwarmonde, Patriarke of Hieruſalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the ſecond, with the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, and their ſeete of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and ſubiected to the Kings of Hieruſalem, and ſo it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing firſt taken Hieruſalem, removed his whole Army and ſate downe before Tyre: drawing his ſeete of ſhippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City as then onely remaining in the Chriſtian power.

The Citizens finding themſelves reduced into great famine, and many other miſeries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fired, burnt, and brake the Saracens ſiege, and ſallying out reſolutely vpon his armie, ſlew ſo great numbers of them, and ſolowed their victory with ſuch fury, as that the Saracens forſaking their Trenches and Tents, removed in great diſorder and diſhonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredericke Barbaroſſa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Chriſtians enemies ouer a Riuer vnſoordable, periſhed by the weight of his armour thererein) was brought and interred in the Cathedra Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garniſhed and grauen with guilt pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before before therein buried: but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turkes.

†. IIII.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Afferites could not obtaine on the South bound of Affer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace: and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Cathor or Cad, and by Zeglerus it is called Hactipos.

But lastly, it was intitled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Agyptian Ptolomies: which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliouly wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphane: the same Alexander hauing married Cleopatra daughter of the fide Ptolome not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Atababacus treacherouly surprized and slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiousnesse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus purified, as it is in the Story ensuing: and by like reason about the same time was the aforefaide Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolome toynd, ouerthrowne & treacherouly murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian: to whom he fled for succour: and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolome: who enioyed not the glory of his victory and treason about three dayes, for God flucke him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seat: two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the Port for safety and capacity not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This City is distant from Iherusalem some foure and thirty miles: foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lamberti: from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the middelt of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Bel-zebub: and therefore called the Castle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharus in Egypt: to giue comfort to the night to those shippes, which came neere and fought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian: but in the yeere 636. (a fatall yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Maomars the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwine the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa: whom a third of the reuenue was giuen in recompence. Againe, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore and seuen, Saladine King of Egypt and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred ninety and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was repossessed and delivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and vterly demolished: though in some fort afterward redified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Five miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne: the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe: yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorable act, among many others: it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were driven to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Affer, to haue bene in the fields of Libanus: betwene the Riuer Adonis, and Zidon: his owne wordes are these:

these: *Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryto, memorant inclytum Christi Militem D. Georgium, Regis filium ab immanissimo Dracone asservasse: eamque, matrem a bestia parenti restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum fuit edificata. In this place, which by the Inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not farre from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon: and hauing killed the beast, delivered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deede a Church was after built there: Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodouicus Roman. Patric. Navigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Affer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegoricall, figuring the victory of Christ, than accept of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.*

†. VI.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazab, which Saint Hierome calleth Achzaph, and Iosephus Ecdippus, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Afferites. Belforrest findes Acziba: and Sandalium, or the Castle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelve Reachers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauielled as farre to the North as Reob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Affer, which Rechob, as also Beroth which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids time to the King Iadabhezzer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chap. and 8. verse, and chap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Afferites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achzaph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbab, and Aphbek did.

This Aphbek it was, whose wall falling downe, slew seuen and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Abah. Here Iunius finds that the Phylistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphbek there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue bene in Iuda. Of which Ios. 15. and 53. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reads, Fortuer, for in Aphbek. Where others conuert it, Percutens Syros in Aphbek.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre: and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betwene Acziba and Tyre: which Castle Baldwine the first rebuilt and fortified; in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he vnderooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentifull Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living Waters: from whence not only all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawne: but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to traueile till it recover the Sea, driueth fixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brochard.

Within the Land, and to the East of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa: and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achzaph, or Acab, or after Saint Hierome Aczapha: a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Merom.

†. VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Farther into the Land towards Jordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugo de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter-moist Hilles of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians: the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Humfrey of Thoron, Countable to Baldwine the third, King of Iherusalem, lyeth buried: There were fixe Castles besides this within the Territory of Affer: where-

The Rivers which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoas, Jordan, Eleutherus, Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Affer, are those Hilles about Tyre, and the Hilles of Saron, both exceeding fruitful: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nelo, or the Mountaine of Abarim, in Reuben, Moses beheld Libanus threescore miles distant.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTHALIM.

t. l.

Of the bounds of Nephthalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

The next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Asher, was the vpper Galilee: the great citie wherof fell to the lot of Nephthaim, the fonne of Jacob by Billa, the land-made of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to beare armes, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leaving their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their Sonnes so 45400. besides, Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeeres of age. The Land of Nephthaim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fontaines of Jordan, and the Hillies of Libanus adioyning, as faire South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Asher, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adjoining to this Territory of Nephthim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabite, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the height of the Mountaines adjoining shadowed from the Sinne, the better part of the day. Poitellus calles it Balbec; Niger, Marbech; and Leoniscus, Beallibeca.

Of this name of Utopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrews, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Bethemes, or after the Latines, Solis oppidum, or Tomes Solis; The City of the Sunne: into which, faith Vitrian, Seuerus the Roman Emperor sent a Colonne: the other Utopolis nameth Dealmarch: and of this name Stephanus also findeth the City in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adjoining to Nephtulim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, over which Dierol, Arrippa, and Berenice the Quene command.d.

Abila alioque name to the Region adjoining, of which Izanius the sonne of Tiro the Elder, became Tetrarch or Gouverneur: whereof Ptolomee gave it the addition of Izaniy, and called it Abila Izaniy. Volterrann names it Abila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volaterran is intitled Aphileus, not Aisles. After that this City of Abila or Abila, had received the Christian Faith, Proculus became the Bishop thereof: flaine afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Tyren. For distinction of this City (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered that in the Tribe of Manasse, joyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephthalm, there is another City of the same name, fauing that it is written with an E for an I and called Abela, remembered in the 20. Chapter of the Second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calles Abelmachea, and Hierome Bethmacha. In the place of Samuel for distinction like it is written, Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Towne of Maahaca, the wife of Macir, the sonne of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Majim. This City *Ioa*b besieged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled therto for succour: but a certaine wife woman of the City perswading the people to kill Seba his head over the wall, *Ioa*b retired his Army. The same City was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Benadad: and after a while by Teglathphasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground, and therefore no maruell, that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for euery of bewailing many places tooke name, as Bochim, Iudg. 2.4.

and so doubtlesse * Abel-Misraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Iarius in his note vpon Num. 33. <sup>And Abel</sup> 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground there (to Sum. 1. 1.
wit, in the Land of Maab.) and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Reg. 2. 24 Towne of Elijah the Prophet: also Abel-Vincaur of the Ammenites, whither Iephia pur Reg. 19. 11 sued them. Magnum. 11. 35.

Of Casarea Philippi.

There was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephthim, that renowned City of Lais, or Lajich, as Tunius writes it, or Lechen, which City the children of Dan being straitened in their Territory vnder Juda invaded and mastered, and gave it the name of their owne Parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genesis the fourteenth, at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as far as Sobah, formerly remembred in the diuision of Syria, otherwise called Sophena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Lechem-Dan. Weissenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneua Lajib, Iosephus, Dana; Beniamin, Belina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Neuburgensis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Brocard the Monke, and Pestellus: who also raketh this City to be the fame, which in Matthew the 15. verse 39. in the Euangel is called Magedon, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in Saint Mark speaking of the same fort, Dalmathina. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemeth that it was either a free City of the alliance and confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subiect vnto the Kings thereof, for it is written in the eighteenth of Judges, And there was none to help, because Lais was as farre from Zidon: and they had no businesse with other men, for it was aboute thirty English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.

In after-times when these Regions became subiect to the State of Rome, it had the Plin. l. 5. c. 15.
 50 name of PANCA, from a Fountaine adjoining to called: and therefore Ptoleme calles it Cafarea PANCA. Hegeffippus calles it Parnium (saith Weffenburg: but he had read it in a corrupt copy: for in Hegeffippus let out by Badui, it is written Pancum without an R); and at such times as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Gallilee, became Gouvernour of Traconitis, sometime Bafan, this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to give memory to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Caesar, he called it Cafarea Philippi; and so it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis: and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned: by hita in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neronada. But as Strabo saith, Plin. l. 5. c. 15.

a Iosephus in the book of the Iewish war 18. faith that Philop the Tetrarch cast chaffe into a fountain called Phas. It stant 20. stadia North-east from Cesaree, which chaffe being carried under ground was cast up to be game at Pan or Dan, wherby it is conceived that the first Spring Jordan is to this fountain called Phas from wher Jor and Dan receive their waters.

nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembered their former Pamela, and so recalled it, with the Terrority adjoyning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloody issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith: who afterward, as there was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodness, and no lesse grateful for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could be moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feete, and holding up her hands towards him. These three mounted upon two great Bases or Pedestalls of the same Metall, which were placed by a Fountaine neere her owne Houle: both which (saith Eusebius) to remaine in their first perfection, even to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who lived in the Reigne of Constantine the Great. But in the yeare after Christ 363. that Monster Julian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting up the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heaven broken into fireers: the head, body, and other parts, sundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time living. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Isidore the Historiographer in his fifth booke, and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of those two Rivers which arising from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two apparent Fountains of Iordan: in a foyle exceeding fruitful, and pleasant, for, as it is written, Judges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the World. In the fields belonging to this City it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was awarded, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City received the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the fame fortune with the reft, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: ynder Fulch the fourth King of Itiersalem, and after the death of Godsfrey of Bullbon, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians, and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now irenowith with all that part of the World subiect to the Turke.

†. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

Among the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capharnaum is not the least: so often remembered by the Euangelists. This City had the honour of Christ's preference three yeeres: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the Doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable Prophecy of Efay 9. The people that walked in darkness, have seen a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined.

death, upon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Iordan, euen where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich soyle: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophesied in those words, And thou Capernaum which art lifted up vnto heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c. which I heere the pride and greatness of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some market of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth: it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Bernard Breidenbeck and Salimac affirme, that it then consisted but of six poore Fishermans houles.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolis or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in Saint Matthew, Mark, and Luke, also remember'd; but I find no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had; and so Plinius himselfe <sup>is</sup> conflicted; for Marius Niger speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the mountaine Cafus in Cassia; and endeth it to the South at Aegypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Calabria, all Palestina, and Judea.

Plumie also makes it larger, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, hee numbrell four of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first the three, Damascus, Ophe, Raphana, then Philadelphus: (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I like Amana rather, because it was the chiefe City of the Ammonites, knowne by the name of Rabbab, before Ptole. Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Scythopolis, some time Nisā, built (as is false) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nhrfe, who died therein, anciently known by the name of Beſhan, for the sixth he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Caeſſyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleucia;) but this Gadara in Baſan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, ſeated on an high hill, nere the River of Hieromaix. This River Ortelius takes to be the River Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manſſelſe on Tordan: but he miſtaketh it, for Hieromaix falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betweene Hippas and Geraſa, whereas Iaboc encreth the ſame Sea betweene Ephraim and Phanuel. For the ſeventh he nameth * Hippas, or Hippion, a City ſo called of a Colonie of Horſemen there garriſoned by Herad, on the Eaſt-ſide of the Galilean Sea, deſcribed hereafter in the Tribe of Manſſeſſe over Tordan. For the eighth Pella, which is alſo called Butiſ, and Berenice, ſeated in the South border of the Region over Tordan, called Peraa. For the ninth Gelaſa, which Iſeſopus takes to be Geraſa: and Geraſa is found in Caeſſyria by Iſeſopus, Hegeſippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomee (whom I rather follow) in Phœnicia. The tenth and laſt, Plinie nameth Canatha, and ſo doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calles Camala, but Hegeſippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Baſan over Tordan, ſo called, becauſe thoſe two Hillies on which it is ſeated, haue the ſhape of a Camell. But the collection of theſe ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Bruchard, Bräidenbach, and Salguicæ, which makes them to be theſe; Cæſarea Philippi, and Afor, before remembred, Cedes, Nephthelim, Sepher, Corazin, Capharnaum, Beſſaida, ſotapata, Tiberias, and Scythopolis, or Beſhan. For all other Authours diſagree herein, and give no reaſon for their opinion. One place of the Euangelift Saint Matthew makes it manifeſt, that this Region called Decapolis, was all that Tract betweene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed aſine from the coaſts of Tyruſ and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the middeſt of the coaſts of Decapolis: ſo that it was bounded by Daniſcus and Libanus on the North: by the Phœnician Sea, betweene Zidon and Ptolomeus on the Weſt: by the Hillies of Gelbo and Beſhan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwiſe Hermom, Sanir, and Galad, on the Eaſt: which is from Eaſt to Weſt the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, nere the ſame diſtance which may be each way forty Engliſh miles.

†. V.
f Hamath.

Bv to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated neere the foote thereof the City of * Hammath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adioyning taketh name: the fame which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: a Iacobus Zeigler, Isuraw, Isuraw: Regio tenet borealia tribus Nep- thili, per montem Libanum usq; Trachones. The Countrey of Isuraw, faith he, containeth the North parts of the Tribe of Nephthali, along the Mount Libanus to Trach- ones. But herein following Strabo, who calles Trachonitis Isuraw, he mistakes the seate of this Region : and so doth Mercator. For indeede were Isuraw (which Hoge- sippus calles Perraz, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the fame with Tracemitis, yet Tracemitis is selfe is farre more to the East than Hammath in Nephthali: for Tracemitis lieth betwene C- asarea Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones : which the Hebrewes call Gilead : and this Hammath or Chammah is seated under Casarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Celestria beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which <sup>b</sup> Hierome vpon Amos calles Antiochia, with Hammath or Hamath the lesser in Phenicia; and Nephthali, which he calleth Epiphania for this Hammath, or in our Translation Hamah, (and nor that which is commonly called for this Hammath, or to our 1st translation Hammath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8, 3, is far from the North border of Canaan in Syria Saba) is remembered in Numbers 34, verse 8, and Numbers 13, verse 22, and in Ezekiel 47, verse 15. In the first of which places it bordereth the Land of promise, these being the words: From Hammath thou shalt point (that is, direct or draw a line) unto the river Hammath: In there is mention of Hamath the great, as it seems, for distinction from the other in Nephthaliim, though Matt. Beroladim reiecting Hierame, rather follow the opinion of Zeiger above mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be justified, that either one or other of these is either Autiochia or Epiphania, howbeit that the same City which Iofua 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephthaliim, was also called Chammath (whence the word Hamath & Emath, were framed) it may be gathered partly because the other Hamath, a Cham. R. 3. for distinction is called Chammath Ticks, as this (as it may seeme by Iof. 12. 31.) was Chammath Der and Chamath Judea, as we have noted. 2 Reg. 24. Secondly, because Nab. 24. and also Ezekiel 47. 10. Chamath is in the North side of the holy Land, is placed too neere the West corner, to the North border which begins at the great Sea, they make Atseph to name neerer a place Eastward along all the breadth of the holy Land, yett it will come to Herman (for so they expound Mount Hir. Nam. 24. 7.) and beyond Herman Eastward in this North side they make him to name diuers Townes, first Chamath, then Tzedai, then Ziphon, and lastly, Chasfar-benai, a male name, which we must needs expound Har to be one of the Hilles neere Sidon, and so those Townes, as they are named by him in order on the North side of Atseph, Nephthelim, and Atseph, and in like manner those in Bezekel: first, Chelon, then Chamath, and so in order, Bereth, Sibram, Tzedai, Chasfar-benai. c. Of which Isa. 19. 35. d Which Rebub, or Rebub, in Isa. 19. 38. is placed in Atseph towards Zidon, in the confines of Nephthelim.

which it hath to the West Sea, and the City of Rebub adioyning prouide it: the other Hamath or Emath (being farre removed and beyond the forenamed mountains, which inclose all those Lands which Israel euer had possession of) is that Emath, which is also called Ituraea, witnesse c. Stella and Laicean; and not that in Nephthelim, where Ionathas Machabeus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

For though Trachonitis be comprehended within Ituraea (and therefore it is saide to be frimta Galilee Gentium) yett it hath beginning ouer the mountains Trachon, and so it stretcheth into the plains of the Territory of Ituraea; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch or President both of Ituraea and Trachonitis: both which are ouer Iordan towards the East. But Chamath in Nephthelim, is on the West side of Iordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Country Ituraea was so called of Itetur one of the sonnes of Ismael, it is placed in the bounds of Calefryia and Arabia the Desert.

The people Iturci were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers: Of whom Ituros Taxi torquentur in arcibus.

Of Engli the Iturians bowes were made.

This City Chamath or Hamath in Nephthelim seemes to haue beene as ancient as the other in Ituraea, both built by Amathues the eleuenth son of Canaan. Whether in the time of Dauid, this, or the other had Tobu for King, it is not certaine; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mount iunes, and Hamath in Nephthelim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subigation Tobu reioyced, because Hadadezer whom the Damasceni came to helpe, was his enemy. This Tobu fearing the strength and prosperity of Dauid, hearing of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brass.

But it seemeth that Dauid in such great successe should not haue had peace with Tobu, if he had beene King of any place in Nephthelim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tobu: which City Salomon after his Fathers death made himselfe Master of, as a part of the lands (* in the larger and conditionall promise ) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

But this Hamath of Nephthelim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being, as it hath beene saide, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanius, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a City well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greeces by Epiphania.

†. V I.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath towards Iordan standeth the Citie Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountaine Daphnia: which falleth into the lake of Ademora. Heer. c. 10. 10.

was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Iericho: and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor: who to be auenged of Zedekias infidelity, beyond the proportion of pietie, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that euer he should behold in this world, and so the most remembered, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out: and binding him in yron chaines, he was led a slave to Babylon, in which estate he ended his life. Of which feldeame-exempld calamitie, though not in expresse words, Hieremie the Prophet fore-told him in Ierusalem not long before: But Ezekiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldeans, yett shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

There are besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephthelim, as that which is called Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in Isachar, another in Juda, of which Isa. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of Nephthelim, as Iudg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Isa. 20. 7. Kedesh in Galilee in monte Nephthali: Iosephus calls it Cedesis, and in Saint Hieroms time it was called Cidissus. Besoreff greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desert of Pharan.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iosua, it was made a Citie of refuge, and giuen to the Leuites. Herein was Barac borne, who overthrow the Armie of the second Abin of Hazor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime possessed by Teglabphalasser, when he waited all Nephthelim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolitan Region: When it had embraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zephe, which was also one of the ten Decapolitan Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeeres the inexpugnable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those Regions, both In-land and Maritime neere it. Touching Rama of Nephthelim, seated Northward neere Sephet: this is to be noted, that there are diuers places of this name in Palestine, in the Mountain Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebrais excellens; Ramah with the Hebreues was in Dauid a Rou a breues is high.) Also that from this Rama Isa. 19. 36. they read Arama, making the article (which it hath in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Townes) to be a part of the word: whence calling away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place Bethselem, of which Isa. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephthelim, Iudg. 1. 33. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephthelims.

Adioyning to which standeth Carthan or Kiriathajim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountains out of which the Springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Christi: a place by our Saviour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the Euangelists.

Adioyning to these are Magdala, a place of strength, and Mesaloth, of which we reade that it was forced by Bacchides in the time of the Machabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Bereths of Nephthelim. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, one neere Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (vpon a weake coniecture out of Isa. 1. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neere the waters of Merom, because the Kings that ioyned with Abin against Iosua, which incamped at the waters of Merom, Isa. 11. 5. are by Iosephus said to haue incamped at the Citie Beretha in Galilee, not farre from Cedes a superior, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Beretha of which Ezek. 47. 6. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the upper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Beretha neere Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Machabai we haue spoken already) this he doth vpon a coniecture touching the place 2. Sam. 10. 14. where some reade Abel or Beith-machabai, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berim of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Beretha or Berith) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Beretha of Nephthelim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembered by Ezek. 47. 18. 25.

S. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABVLON.

Zabulon or Zebulon, another of the sonnes of Isaac by Lea, there were multied at Mount Sinai 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged vna-ble persons: all which dying in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to be armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the Ri-uer Chifon: Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea shore, of which Ioseph. Ant. 13. c. 19. Debshet of * which Iof. 19. 11. Iekonam or Iekneham (whole Iud. 2. 2. *Ne-
King* was slain by Iofua, and the City was given to the Leuites) and Gaba after called thel in Canaan, of a Regiment there garrisoned by Herode. Then the City which in Galilee. Of beareth the name of Zabulon, or the Citie of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, & Simon it may be doubted:
for Angelus

Alit. 10. 4. *Si-

which word

Luke. 1. 10.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Cath, of which *Iof. 19. 15. on the border of *Asheand beyond it the lesser Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted Water into Wine: the native Citie of Nathaniel, and as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountaines of Zabulon: and then the Citie of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghithron) which defended it selfe against Zabulon. Then Berabe which standeth in the partition of the vpeper and nether Galilee, fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes. Not farre from hence standeth Shimron of Meron whole King was slain by Iofua.

Then Damna or Dimna, a Citie of the Leuites: then Noa or rather Noga, of which *Iof.
19. 13. Then Dothan or Dothan, where Ioseph found his brethren feeding their flocks:
the same wherein Eliazar besieged by the Syrians, strooke them all blinde.*

Beyond it towards the East they imagine * Amshar or Amashar: then Remmon of the Leuites. The last of the Cities on the North border of Zabulon is Bethaida, one of the native Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native Citie of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did manie miracles, but these people being no lesse incredulous then the Capharnaum, and others, thers, received the same Curse of threatened Miseries, as Woe bee vnto thee Bethaida, &c.

Alongst the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethaida, was the strong Caltie of Magdalu, the habitation of Marie Magdalen, not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high seated Citie of Isapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surprisid by Vespasian, who slaughtered many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1300. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea and the Lake of Genesareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberias, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cesar:
it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolis, and the great-test and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Sauour called Matthew, from the toll or custome house, to be an Apostle, and neere vnto it raised the daughter of Tairis from the toll death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the and the beginning of the reigne of Tiberius Cesar: in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in the aground full of Sepulchers: Quum iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) *ad septem dies impurihabetur, quin talibus locis habet; whereas by our law hee should be seven daies held as vn-clean, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Iosephus it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinnereth, which was leaced, not in Zabulon, but in Nephtalim.*

Neere vnto this Tiberias, at Emaus, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias: More into the Land toward the South-west is Bethulsa, feated on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the story of Holgernes and Indith, such as it is. Neere which standeth Bethcem of Zabulon: and adioyning vnto it, Capharath fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes: and Iapha an exceeding strong place, *Iof. in vit. 14.
afterward forced by Titus: who in the entrance, and afterward in furie flew 15000. of the *Iof. 2. Bel. 25.
Citizens*; and caried away about two thousand prisoners.*

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Leuites, and Gabara, of which *Iof. 19. 11. Thar-phus in his owne life, then Iasie according to Adrichomius (of which *Iof. 19. 12.) for hee hath Thar-thinks that it is not that Iapha of which wee spake but now out of Iosephus, Ideala of *Thar-which Iof. 19. 15. Hierome calls it Iadela: vnder it Westward, Legio, (afterward a Bishop whence *2. Tho. feate) and the Citie Belma, in ancient times exceeding strong, remembered Indith 7. 3. led Thiber.
otherwise Chelma. Betwene Legio and Nazeret is the Citie Saffa or Saffra, the birth-Citie of Zebedeus, Alpheus, Iames and John: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to *To-Iof. 19. 15. Sephorus according to Brochard: which afterward, saith Hegesippus and Hierome, 20.
was called Diocarea; the Citie of Touchim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; it was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Iosephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee; in another place he saith, Vrbium Galilearum maxime Sephoris & Tibe-40. rias. This Sephoris greatly vexed Vespasian ere he wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Auttocratorida, which is as much to say as Imperially, saith Iosephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zapher.**

To the South-West of this Sephoris or Diocarea was that blessed place of Nazereth, the Citie of Marie the Mother of Christ; in which hee himselfe was conceiued; it stan-deth betwene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly four and twenty yeeres, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward were for many yeeres: It was erected into an Archbishopricke in the following age. Neere vnto it are the Cities Baria (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahalal, of 50. which *Iof. 19. 15. and *Iud. 1. 30. where it is called Nahalal: and *Iof. 21. 35. where it is a Ci-tie of the Leuites, neere the Sea, adioyning to the Riuer of Chifon is Sarid, noted in Iofua for the vertermost of Zabulon.

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diners small Mountaines: but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Apparition of Moses and Elias: and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, Iames, and John: vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared; in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine the Emperesse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe Riuer of Zabulon is Chifon, which rising out of Tabor, runneth with one stream.

stream Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another stream Westward into the great Sea. This River of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Cadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Ptolomie calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguish them, and set Chorfeus by Casaria Palestina. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdala: and the third is a branch of a river rising out of the Fontaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdala; which Torrent they call Datham, from the name of the Citie, from which it falleth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so joyning with Jordanus parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Jephthael, which Iosua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

He next adjoining Territorie to Zabulon, to the South and South-west, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the neather Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Agypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the holy Land, 64300.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English mile, or somewhat more; a Citie wherein the Jewes (by the practice of a certaine malicious upstart, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Hieronian, then Gouvernour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captives; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, having first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight upon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: saving that his fire being quenched with the rivers of blood running through every street, he reserved the remainder of slaves and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Geshon, or Cishion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembered in the first of Kings 4.4.17. then Abes or Ebets, Ios. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Ios. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Ios. 21. 29. this also was a City of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboa take beginning: and range themselves to the Mediterran Sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezabel, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpasses, according to Zeyler; and Enadda, or Hen-chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those, Aphec or Apheca, which Adrichomius placeth in Isachar: betwene which and Suna, he saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of blood, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Reguli assisting Benhadad, incurred Achib: and were overthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harneis boast himselfe, as he hath putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following, in the fields, as they say, adjoining to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomfited by Acab: and 100000. footmen of the Arames or Syrians slaine: before which overthrow the seruants and Counsaillers of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should overcome them.

Vnder Aphec towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon, in the plaines of Galilee, so called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Magedo: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphec to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casaleth, of which, 1 Machab. 9. 2. Anem or Hen-Gannim of the Leuites, and Seefima or Shahafima, the West border of Isachar, of which Ios. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Seacoast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrimes: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-house and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Tolouse.

From the Castle of Pilgrimes the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthestmost farthestmost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the River Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make trial whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped, by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed; and cut their owne flesh after their manner, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuite of his enemies: or at Iezabel sure, or perchance asleepe, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the bankes of Chifon adjoining.

At the foot of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caiphas, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Porfina and Porphyrus, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seate. Returning againe from the Seacoast towards Tiberias by the bankes of Chifon, there are found the Citie of Hapharaim or Abraham, and the Castles of Meza, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the River Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gates whereof Christ raised from death the widowes onely sonne.

Then Sein or Shion named Ios. 19. betwene the two Hills of Hermon, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchauntresse that vndertooke to raise up the body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith named Ios. 19. 21. 20. Then Dabura, as it is named, Ios. 21. 28. or Dobratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 72. This Citie (which lieth it selfe ouer Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Daberath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Theues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Iezabel: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboa on the South, and by Hermon and the River Chifon on the North. In these plaines Gedeon ouerthrew the Midianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and the Tartars against the Saracens.

§. VII.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

†. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

He next Tribe which ioyneth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Joseph, the eleventh sonne of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Puaphar, Priest and Prince of Helipolis: which Manasses with his brother Ephraim, the grand-children of Jacob, were by adoption numbered amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made up the number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Agypt, as they were numbered at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Deserts, there entered of his issue, 52700. bearing armes. The Territorie which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan on the East, and Dora upon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Israel on the North, and Machmasa is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name; which Solinus confirms. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the lesse, and passed into the South, to the vttermost of Calosyria, they built this Citie anew, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians given by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation

6. II.
Of the Kings of Tyre.

BVt whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the booke of Zeno, Sachomias, Manæsa, and others of that Nation, being nowhere found) of the same is to bee gathered out of the Scriptures, Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iosaph, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what King succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Grecians besieged Troy, Phœnix governed Phœnicia.

In Hieremie time, and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee invaded Greece, Tetranesius ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, & Zidon: who commanded, as some writers ascribe, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persians: for being broken into Reguli, and petty Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiect by Nabuchodonosor; of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembered, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetranesius, remembered by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependance vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Grecians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came between Tennes and Strato. For there were contained 130. yeeres and somewhat more between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more unworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) he rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who foresaw their vtter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition thereunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenæus out of Theopompus reporteth, that he was a man of ill liuing: and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women dancers, and singers: whom hee to this end chiefly imired, and assembled: that liuing beheld the most beautifull and liuely among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of this strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were near him with an Armie too waighy for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians: he determining to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrestled the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne bodie, and died.

After Alexander was posselt of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, He gaue the Kingdome to Hephæstion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith, and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, desired Hephæstion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolominus, Iustine Abdolomius, and Plutarch Alynomus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting heards and roots, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wife man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular or Aristocraticall: and by times and turnes subiect to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asseir.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Josephus the Historian, as is saide, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Josephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be be gathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians, but these Authors, though they both pretend to write out of Menander Ephesus, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes; nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, that Josephus and Theophilus remember: whom Theophilus calls Abephalus: the same perchance: that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Siron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus. David (saith Eusebius out of Eusebius) constrained this Siron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psal. 83.

Hiram succeeded Siron, whom Josephus calls Iram, and Theophilus sometime Hieronimus, sometime Hieramus, but Tatian and Zonaras Chiram. He entered into a league with David, and sent him Cedars with Mafsons and Carpenters, to performe his building in Hierusalem: after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom he not only furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of mony, but also he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Ophir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Nauigators: & lent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not only mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Josephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3. booke, in Tatianus his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonaras Tome the first. This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee despised the 20. Townes which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: & gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Ashteroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Baleastartus whom Theoph. Antiochenus, calleth Bazarus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon, and reigned 7. yeeres according to Josephus.

Abdastartus the eldest sonne of Baleastartus, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Josephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeeres, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurf, the eldest of them held the Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Aflarus brother to Abdastartus, recovered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. yeeres.

Aflarus, or Atharimus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Aflarus, and ruled 9. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Baleastartus, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Aflarus, and reigned 8. months; liued 50. yeeres.

Ithobalus (or Ithobalus, in Theophilus) son to the third brother Aflarus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Goddess Astarte, which was a dignity next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vnckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, the same which in the first Kings, chap. 16. is called Ethbaal, whose daughter Jezabel, A. Theophilus, chab married.

Badezor or Bazar the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Jezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Metimus succeeded Badezor, & reigned but 9. yeeres (saith Josephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Metimus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the seventh yeere of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. months, after the Temple of Salomon: which by our accompt was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aneas and Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion couetous of Sicheus his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Altar: wherupon Elisa feare to be deposed of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as afore said: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mothers teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barca in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Serrinus interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts; others from Iudidia, a surname of Salomon.

Elulens

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion : and reigned 36. yeeres : the same that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmanassar, in the Port of Tyre : notwithstanding which, he continued his siege before it on the Land side five yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobalus gouerned the Tyrians, who vaunted himselfe to be as wise as Daniel : and that he knew all secrets (saith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter : out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was slaine in that long siege of Nabuchodonosor : who furrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he prevailed.

But followed Ethobalus, was reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchance, to Nabuchodonosor : for after his death, it was gouerned by diuers Iudges, succeeding each other : First, by Ecnabulus, then by Chelbis, Abarus the Priest, Mittonus, and Gerasus, who held it among them some 7. yeeres, and olde months : after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere : after him Merbalus sent from Babylon 4. yeeres : after him from thence also, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whose reigne Cyrus beganne to gouerne Persia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumaeans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them receiued and brought into Phenicia the knowledge of the true God.

Of the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a discourse of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozeus that hath written a Treatise at large, intituled de uicinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who onely is vchangeable, and the same for euer; yet whereas the sayde Bozeus, informing here-hence, that the prosperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forsaking the true Religion, to proue this his assertion, supposeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumaeans, descended from Esau, Isaacs brother : first, it can hardly be beleeued that Tyre, when it flourished most in her ancient glory, was in any sort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (besides the prooffe which the Scriptures giue of Hirams good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many coniectural arguments; whereof the strongest is their pedigree and descent : it being likely in his opinion, that the posterity of Esau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Isaac. That the Tyrians were Edumaeans, he endeouours to shew, partly by weakere reasons, painfully strained from some affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight : partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, & others witness, that the Tyrians came from the Red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrrus, Aradus, and Sidon : which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phenicia. Considering therefore that all the coast of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumaeans : as Elab and Esiogaber; or vnder the Amalekites, who descended of Amalec the Nephew of Esau, whose cheefe City was Madian, so called of Midian the sonne of Abraham by Cethura, whose posterity did people it: the consequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edumites: differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Israel. Heerunto he addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worship of Astartus, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Phercydes being Phenicians, themselves differed much in their Philosophy from the idolatrous customes of the Greekes. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumaeans, was an Vniuersity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphas the Temanite, who disputed with Iob, Religion was sincerely taught.

Such is the discourse of Bozeus, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deserues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumaeans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his People: neither is it true that they were Edumaeans at all. In what Religion Esau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himselfe was a prophane man, and disauowed by God, the Scriptures in plaine termes expresse. That his posterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the second booke of Chronicles. That the Edumites were perpetuall enemies to the House of Israel, saue onely when Dauid & some of his race, Kings of Iuda, held them in subiection, who knowes not? or who is ignorant rant of Dauids vnfriendly behauiour amongst them, when first they were subdued : Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betwene Tyrrus & Mount Seir, that Hiram held such good correspondence with Dauid : euen then when Joab slew all the males of Edom : neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Israel, that the Edumites were so ill intreated. It seemeth that the piety and ancient wisdom of Eliphas the Themanite was then forgotten, and the Edumaeans punished, for being such as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeede the City of Teman whence Eliphas came to reason with Iob, is not that in Edumaea, but another of the same name, lying East from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the Country of Iob : and name, lying East from the City of Bildad the Subite, as both such Chorographers who best knew those parts, do plainly shew, and the holy Text makes manifest. For Iob is said to haue exceeded in riches; and Salomon in wisdom, all the people of the East; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Palestina. True it is that Eliphas the sonne of Esiu had a sonne called Teman : but that Fathers were wont in those dayes to take name of their sonnes, I no where finde. And Ismael also had a son called Thema : of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the East had the name: for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, & all they of the East are called Ismaelites. And he that wel considers how great and strong a Nation Amalec was, which durst giue battaile to the Host of Israel, wherein were 60000. able men, will hardly beleue that such a people were defended from one of Esiu his grand-children. For how powerful and numberlesse must the forces of all Edom haue bene : if one Tribe of them, yea one Family of a Tribe had bene so great : surely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to do with Amalec : or assisted the Amalekites : when saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom : but a Nation of it selfe, if distinct from the Ismaelites. The like may be said of Midian, that the Founder thereof being son to Abraham by Cethura, doubtles was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the Seignory of the Red-sea coast, which Bozeus imagines the Edumaeans to haue held : if the Edumites in after-times held some places as Elan and Esiogaber on the Red Sea shore, yet in Moses time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moses himselfe saith, that Israel did compass all the borders of Edom : within which limits had Midian stood, Moses must needs haue known it: because he had sojourned long in that Country: and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Aegypt.

But coniectural Arguments, how probable soeuer, are needlesse in so manifest a case. For in the 83. Psalm Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as distinct Nations: yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authors shew, and Bozeus himselfe confesseeth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene destroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Aser, Ios. 29. because they were Idolaters, and of the cursed seede of Canaan, not Cousins to Israel, nor professions of the same Religion. For though Hiram said, Blessed bee God that hath sent King Dauid a wise sonne : we cannot inferre that he was of Dauids Religion. The Turke hath sayde as much of Christian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worshipped Astartus, and drew Salomon also to the same Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, he did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouision of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes or Villages in Galilee. And if wee rightly consider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon, He allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-pestered : being otherwise apt to yelde filkes: as the Andarine filkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well spare to Salomon. Also Gold for Land : wherein Salomon was the wiser, who hauing got the gold first gaue to Hiram the worst Villages that he had: with which the Tyrrans was ill pleased. But it was a necessary policy which enforced Tyrrus to hold league with Israel. For Dauid had subdued Mozab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates : thorough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carrie and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their fleets on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrrus : so that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to passe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps haue brought them euen into subiection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent works, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages between Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of piety in the Tyrians: so those other proofes which Bozins frames negatively vpon particular examples, are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I think no man knowes. It seemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecrades are but single examples. Euerie falgate Nation hath some wisdom: excelleth the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good imitation of the Gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Cadmus, Pitca, Lapiti, Cadiz, and all Colomes of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Hebrew men iournd in the Red Sea to haue bene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This then Idolatry from Salomon time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozins, who would haue vntied them to haue bene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, impious Philistines, as if he were impious to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozins would better haue agreed with Iulian the Apostate, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romans, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neerest vnto the true Religion: what may be saide of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon every new victory? How few great battailes did the Romans win, in which they vowed not either a Temple to some new God, or some new Honor to one of their old Gods: yea, what one Nation, true onely that of the Iewes, was subdued by them, whose Gods they did not afterward entertaine in their City? Only the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiected, vbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were weakness of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vsed against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Ciue of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought, for prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozins, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indifferen is usually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainly fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimeras of Diuinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperance ignorance. Great pitty is it, that such mad dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious vertue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Auing now past ouer Phenicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excessum for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose yllnes when they left Aegypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts, (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Iordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Iordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The first and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samarita, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Anur or Homri King thereof, and seated on the toppe of the Mountaine Somron, which ouer-looketh all the bottome, and as farre as the Seacoast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of August. Cesar. This City is often remembered in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building, for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater then those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other heuie and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beate to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Heliseus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Grecian Monkes.

Nere Samarita toward the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient City of Sichem; after the restoration called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napolsa: It was destroyed by Simcon and Leui, in reuenge of the rauishment of their sister Dinah: and after that by Abimelec euened with the soyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Danians cast it downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharaton or Pirbathon on the Mountaine Amalec, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Nere to this Citie Iudas Machabeus ouerthrew Seron and Lyfias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This City had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betwene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Ios. 10. And Saron whose King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, saith Adrichome. Though indeed the name Saron is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region: for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Cesarea and Ioppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Ezra, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdias, reade Saron for Asaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine nere Lidda: which Lidda in this time was called Diopolis, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudaea, the first in dignity (or the third after Pliny) where Saint Peter (non sua sed Christi virtute) culled Aneas. Niger call all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe Sarena. This Ioppe was was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Rauens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most saluage and barbarous Nations.

In Diospolis (saith will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to be built ouer his Tomb, the be Tyrus his words: Reliqua a dextris locis maritimis Antipatrie, & toppe, per late patenter plantum Elutheriam pertranssumes, Liddam que est Diospolis, ubi & egregii Martyris Georgij: sive hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, peruenimus, eius Ecclesiam quam ad honorem eiusdem Martyris pius & orthodoxus Princeps Romanorum, Augustus Iulianus multo studio & deuotione prompta edificari preceperat, &c. They haueing left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Tonnus Antipatrie, and toppe, passing ouer the great open plaine of Elutheria, came to Lidda, which is Diospolis: where the sumptuous Tomb of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Gedly & Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Iulianus had commanded to be built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrus, by whose testimonie, we may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vprore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulcher stand? occasioned the vprore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would giue attempt to ouerthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports, who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might haue rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest their Reliques had bene gathered vp, Churches should be built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name liues in the right honorable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrus about cited, wifelyer to haue bene buried at Lidda, or Diospolis. The same also is confirmed by Varro. S. Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Nere to Lidda or Diospolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward Lidda, and Ramatha, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Iuda nere Therem in the way of Hebron; another in Nephthalim, not far from Seber; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Sephoris; a fourth, which they make the same with Mo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued, and wherein he is buried.

From hence to the North along the coast are Holon, or Aston of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the war of the Jewes, Allo Edissifa (for which Iunius, 2. Reg. 4. 42 reads plimies Shalisha) they place here about in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Shalisha, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofia, one of the Toparchies or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

Then Thamnath-fara, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Presidencies of Iuda, which they call Thamnathia; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gauas, which City and Territory, Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua; who also amplified it with buildings, nere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieroms time, and ouer it the Sonne engrauen, in memory of that greatest of wonders, which God wrought in Iosua's time.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Iudas Maccabem with 3000. Jewes overthrew the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; nere to Gaser or Ger, or which Iosua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharaos of Agypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon re-built it.

To the East of this place is the Frontier Citie of Ieffeti, of which Ios. 16. 3. otherwise Pelabbi, whence Dauid had put of his Pretorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benai. Then that high and famous Mountaine and Citie of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yeeres, till the Philistines got it.

To this they ioyned the Citie of Machmas or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabem See in Beniamin, inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Natioth where Saul prophesied; and nere to Ephron, one of those Cities which Abijah recovered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. Then Kibzaim, of the Leuites, of which Iosua 21. 2. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmeah, of which 1. Chro. 6. 28. As for Abisalom's Balsaf, which they finde here about, Iunius reads it in the Plaine of Chatzor; and findes it in the Tribe of Iuda; as Ios. 15. we read of two Chatzors in that Tribe; one nere Kedesh, v. 23. and the other the same as Chetron, v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the Citie of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Bastard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus 1. 2. 20. 6. Millo, reads incole munitionis, and for Salomo edificabit Millo, he reads edificabit munitionem, and so the Septuagint reads in in in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of make in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by Iosua, 1. 12. 16. and Iamach or Iamach spoyled by Teglarphalassar; Pekah then gouerning Israel; with diuers others, but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the Sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Jordan: seuerall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gabas, Iudg. 2. 9. the Hill of Tsalmon or Salmon, Iudg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tjaph or Tjaph, Iudg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tjaphim stood, which was the Citie of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines vpon the sides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Jacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Gen. 49. 22. compared Ioseph's two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her 4 Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezekiel. c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the tenne Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) prophesies: as also in his Lamentation for Iuda, he followeth the other Allegorie of Iacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Iuda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouer-looketh all the plaines on both sides of Jordan, they finde the Cattle called Dok: which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Ios. 1. 11. Iudg. c. 2. in which Cattle as it is, 1. Macc. 16. Ptolomie most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabem his Father in Law.

Among the Riuer of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gauas, remembered in the second of Samuel. c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reads Hiddai ex vna vallium Gabasi: the rather yet the Vulgar and Vulgius reads Giddai of the Riuer of Gauas. Also in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carth, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was fed with the Rauens; and after that the Riuer was dried vp, he traualled (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne he reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby he sustained her life.

§. II.

Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Ieroboam to Achab.

The first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speake: and referre it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Iuda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briofly, beginning after the diuision from Iuda and Beniamin, now I followeth to speake. The first of these Kings Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephraimite of Zereda, who being a man of strength & courage, was by Salomon made ouer-seeer of the buildings of the Munition in Hierusalem, for as much as belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim & Manasse: & so many of them as wrought in those works. During which time as he went from

Hh

Hierusalem,

Jerusalem, he encountered the Prophet Abijah: who made him know that hee was by God defined to be King of Israel: and to command ten of the twelve Tribes. After this fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishak, whom Eusebius calleth Oschores, whose Daughter he married: the Predecessor of which Shishak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Idumean, when he was carried yong into Egypt from the furie of David, and his Captaine Joab; which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes; vling both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdom of Juda; that himselfe might the easier spoile it, as he did: for in the fifth yeare of Ieroboam, Shishak lackt the Citie of Hierusalem, and carried thence all the treasure of David and Salomon, and all the spoiles which David tooke from Adadazer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the ten Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hierusalem to doe their usuall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Beisel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aurons Calfe in Horeb) further he made election of his Priests out of the baselst and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seat and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Iudean Prophet, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycas toel: his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatry; and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Abijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posterity.

He was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Juda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam was slaine, and rooted out by Baascha, who raigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baascha the sonne of Abijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Asa King of Juda: he defeated himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Juda, to restrain their excursions. Hereupon Asa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who invaded Neptulim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Asa carried away the Materials, with which Baascha incended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was threatened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres and died.

To Baascha succeeded Eli his sonne, who at a fast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambris after he had raigned two yeeres: and in him the prophetic of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambris succeeded Eli, and assumed the name of a King seauen dayes; But Ambris in reuenge of the Kings Murder, set vpon Zambris, or Zimri, and inclosed him in Thersa, and forst him to burne himselfe.

Ambris or Hemri succeeded Eli, and transferred the Regall seat from Thersa to Samaria: which he bought of Sheuer, built, and fortified it. This Ambris was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria: the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius Nicephorus, and Zonaras: but how this should stand, I doe not well conclude; seeing Benadad the Sonne of Tabremmon was invited by Asa King of Juda, to assaile Baascha King of Israel, the Father of Eli who forewent Ambris. This Ambris raigned twelue yeeres, sixe in Thersa, and sixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam, borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian.

nian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. He suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias prevailed in the trial of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets: and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after, besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at libertie: for which the Prophet (whom Glycas calleth Michaeas) reprocureth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then ioyning with Iosaphas in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slaine as Michaeas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ioa: besides seauentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and Concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he brui- sed himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beelzebub the God of Achaz. Eliab the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idol, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias sendeth two Captaines, and with each fiftie souldiers to bring Eliab vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercie at *Eliab*s hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the king: afoorsaying it to the king that he must then die, which came to passe in the second yeare of his raigne.

Ioram the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: He allured Iosaphas king of Juda, and the king of Edom to assit him against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Eliha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their king flyeth to Kirharaseth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the wals as a Sacrifice, whereat the three kings moued with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the king of Edom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the king of Moab shewed him ore the wals, threatening, vnlesse the siege were dissolved, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his Gods. Whereupon the king of Edom besought those of Juda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safety of his sonne: which when the other kings refused to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatening had burnt the king of Edoms sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might discernet, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forooke the party of the other kings: for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the king of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answere of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that he doth send to heale a man from his Leprosie? adding, that the Aramite sought but matter of quarrell against him. Eliha hearing thereof, willed the king to send Naaman to him; promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel, and so Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seauen times in Jordan. Eliha refused the gifts of Naaman. But his seruant Geba accepted a part thereof: from whome the sellers of spiriual gifts are called *Geba*ites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon.

Afterward Benhadad king of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoever the Aramite consailed in his secretest council, sent a troupe of horse to take Eliha: all whom Eliha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asked leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Eliha forbade him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent back to their own Prince in safetie.

The king of Aram notwithstanding these benefits, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Eliha. Eliha by prayer caused a noise of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege; an act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azrael obtained the kingdom of Syria by the death of his Maister, Ioram entring vpon his frontiers, tooke Ramoth Gilead: in which war he receiued diuers wounds, and returned to Iezrael to be cured. But whilest he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Eliha) surprized and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Ahab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goes, but also their religion; for which he receiued a promise from God. That his seed should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the idolatry of Ieroboam, for which hee was plagued with greuous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazael the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countreies to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine, saith Cedrenus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28. yeeres.

Ioahaz, or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whom Aziel and his son Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end subiected, leaving him onely 50. horse, 20. che-10 2 King 13. riots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioahaz reigned 17. yeeres.

After Ioahaz Ios his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repaired to Elisba the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba couered the Kings hands with his, and bid him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice, and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or sixe times; and then he should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ios, who ouerthrew the 20
Aramites in three battels, and recouered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Aziel, which his Father Ioahaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazia King of Juda, who provoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hiernsalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ios reigned fixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ios his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is nere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and reigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift & last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassal, who reigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdome but one month, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great cruelty to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with childe. This Menahem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres.

Pekishiah or Phaceia, or after Zonaras Phaceia, succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres, he was slaine by Phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who reigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulassar or Tiglar-Phylassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan Nion, Abel-Bethmaaca, Ianosch, Kedesb, Hisor, and Gilead, with all the Ci-4 ties of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Affryia: he was drawne in by Achab king of Judea against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achab being waisted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith ingaged the Affryan, who first suppressed the Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuading of the great Affryan, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Judea. Pekah reigned twenty yeeres.

Then Hofea or Ofsa, who slew Pekah, became the vassal of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Affryan yoke, he fought aide from So, or Sua, or Sebicur king of Assyria: which being knowne to the Affryan, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaris, and mastered it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Niniue in Affrya, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there disperfed them: and replanted Samaris with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthis (inhabiting about Cutha a fluer in Perfia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharuajim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunted) also with those of Aua, which were of the ancient Antins, who inhabited the Land of the Philistims in Abrahams time, dwelling nere vnto Gaza, whom the Captiues rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desart, called Hauai, willing to returne to their ancient seats. To these he added those of Chamath or or Ituraa, the ancient enemies of the Israelites. and sometime the Vassalls of the Adade of Damascus, which so often afflicted them. And thus did this Affryan aduise himselfe better than the Romanes did. For after Titus and Vespasian had waisted the Cities of Iudea, and Hiernsalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soone decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driuen thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and displantation, hapned in the yeare of the world 3292. the sixth yeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hofea the last 10 King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Juda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

§. 1.

Of Dan, whereof Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

OW following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyntly to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbered at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leaving their bodies with the rest in the Desarts, there entered the Holy Land of their sons 1746 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Ioppe, or Iapha, as in the 19. of Iosua: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hiernsalem. From hence Jonas imbarcked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharsis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabeus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were Garrisons in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape to the sword.

men (saith Polaterran) as Antiochus, Sofus, Cygnus, Dorotheus the Historian, and Artemidorus, who wrote the storie of Bithynia.

In Afcalon, as some say, was that wicked Hered borne, that seeking after our Sauour, caused all the Male-children of two yeeres olde and vnder to be slaine. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladine defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many buildings. Eius muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith A. drichomius.

In Dauids time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee nameth Gath and Afcalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Ionathan: nor is speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Afcalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Next to Afcalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they say) the fonne of Hercules. Other prophane writers asseme, that it was built by Iupiter. Pomp. Mela giues the building thereof to Cambyses the Perfian; because belike hee re-built it, and Gaza in the Perfian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Agypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is proued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Perfia, he receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, & was called Gaza of the Desert.

Alexander Imneus King of the Iewes surprized it: and slew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo which stood thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not serpy in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat nearer the Sea side: though the other was but two mile off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Macchabees; and gaue many wounds to the Iewes till it was forsooke by Simon: of which hee made so great account, as that hee purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left Iohn his Sonne and Successor to bee Gouverneur. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

At the very out-let of the Riner of Besor, standeth Maiona the Port of Gaza: to which the privilege of a Citie was giuen by the great Constantine, and the place called Constantia after the name of the Euphron Sonne. But Julian the Apostate soon after flourishing the Gazens, made it subiect vnto them, and commanded it to be called Gazamartima.

On the other side of Besor, standeth Anibedon, defaced by Alexander Imneus, restored by Hered, and called Agrippias, after the name of Agrippa, the fauorite of Augustus.

Then Raphia, where Philopater ouerthrew the great Antiochus: and beyond it Rhinocura, whose Torrent is knowne in the Scriptures by the name of * the Torrent of Agypt, till the Septuagint conuerted it Rinocura: to difference it, Es. 27. 12. giuing the name of the Citie to the Torrent that watereth it. Plinie calls it Rhinocolora; and Iosephus, Rhinocorus: * Epiphanius reports it as a Tradition, that at this place the world was diuided by lot, betwene the three Sonnes of Noah.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Besor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth betwene Kadesh & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neere to the Wilderness of Beer-shebah, it appeares Gen. 20. 31. and therefore no maruell that as elsewhere Beer-shebah, so sometime Gerar, hee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of olde a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Abimelechs; Saint Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio Alutaria; the healthy Countie: so that it was no maruell that Abraham and Isaac liued much in those parts. Of King Asa's conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Siceleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Besor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sopher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of Dauid: Iofua 15. 49. it is called Vrbs Samma: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Vrbs Arbahi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othaniel, encouraged by Caleb's promise of his Daughter in marriage: but that Iofua and the Host of Israel were at the surprize, it appeares Iof. 10. 39. This Citie Iof. 2. 1. 15. is named among those which out of Simcon and Juda were giuen to the Lewites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simcon, but of lesse fame, as Hijn, of which Iof. 19. 7. which also Iof. 21. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Lewites, giuen out of the portion of Juda and Simcon (for which Ianius thinks Hajbam is named 1. Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Iofua these two are distinguished) also Tholad * And also so named 1. Chron. 4. 39. for which Iofua 19. 4. we haue Eltholad. Chatzar-Sufa so named Iofua 19. 5. for which Iofua 15. we haue Chatzar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Sufa Equitatu.

In the same places of Iofua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Numb. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites pursued the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simcon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Desert.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene Abraham and Abimelec: neere vnto which Hagar wandered with her Sonne Ismael. It was Gen. 21. 31. also called the Citie of Isaac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simcon which are named in the places of Iofua, and of the Chronicles about noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekiel King of Juda, certain of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is, 1. Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Iof. 15. 36. is called Geder and Gederot-haima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they feared themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques of Amalec in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places.

The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chieft: vnto which hee carried the Gate-port of Gaza. The Riuer are Besor, and the Torrent of Agypt called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IUDA.

In Juda the fourth Sonne of Iacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Agypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Deserts. And of their sonnes there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Judaea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simcon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the Children of Juda: who had a kinde of Soueraigntie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Beth-emes, Tsiglag, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the winckle of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chieft of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Judaea from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them some spoyles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Kemi, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Ascensu Scorpionis, or Acrab- him is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to bee in that the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Lida, which begin to rise by Emaus, and end neere Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron: at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham, which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree; and faith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achide, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclothing the olde Castle, erected by Ionathas Macchabeus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the Lake Asphaltite, this Countie had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heaven for their vnaturall finnes.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The fates and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites transgressed Schon King of Hesbon.

IN the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbered at Mount Sinai 46000. who tlying with therest in the Deserts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Jordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Jacob the Nation called Israhel, and afterward Iewes: by Esaú or Edom the Edumaeans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Keturah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly possit by the Canaanites, and by the Families of them defended) these illues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Agypte, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Esaú and his sonnes held Idumee, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael took from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desart, as farre as the Riuer of Tigris, from Sur to Hanish.

Moab took the rest of the coast of the Dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betwene Jordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chebon.

Ammon late dwene on the North-east side of Arnon, and possit the Tract from Rabbah afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as farre North as Arroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betwene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Jordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first possit by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened and broken by Chedor-lobomer, after expelled by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummin or Zurim, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedor-lobomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be understood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Selon or his Ancesters beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countie, betwene Abarim and Jordan, and driven them from Hesbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arruall vpon that border, when Fabel gouerned the Moabites. For he that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Fabel, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were electue, as the Edumaeans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab betwene Arnon and Jordan, as farre North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arruied there out of Agypte, it was in the possession of Selon, of the race of Canaan by Amoreus: and therefore did Leptah the Iudge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countie against the claime of the Ammonites: to because (as he alledged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Leptah) had 300. years time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should maruell why the Ammonites in Leptahs time should make claime to these Countie: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue bene the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the yron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites possessed, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Selon was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seared to confusedly together that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, & Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Leptahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraignie: and againe that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Arroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking aduantage of the time, they then sought to recouer it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Selon at Iabac, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Arroer, and betwene it and Iabac: Selon and Og two Kings of the Amorites hauing displaced both Moab and Ammon out of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. 21. 24. that Israel conquered the Land of Selon from Arnon vnto Iabac, euen vnto the children of Ammon, so as at this time the Riuer of Iabac was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iabac, which at length the Gadites possit, as in the the 13. chapter of Iosua, vers. 25: it appeares.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemoth, for which the Pulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Ieshon. The Pulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36. and 37. in 21. Ios. being wanting in the olde Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedson for Kedmoth, which Kedson by writing slip into Ieshon.

This Citie which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desart adioyning; from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Selon. In the same place of Iosua where this Kedmoth is mentioned, the Pulgar for Besler & villa eius, reads Beser in Salutidine Misfor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichomius makes a Towne called Misfor, in the border betwene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemoth neere the Dead Sea (for the Countie betwene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lasa or Leshah, of which Genes. 10. verse 19. The Greekes call it Cal-lirhoe: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water: all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elder, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired: but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macherus in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Imperators. The other towne is Macherus, the next betwene Lasa and Jordan: of all that part of the world the strongest Inland Citie and Castle, standing vpon a Mountaine euery way vnacceffible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier againſt the Arabians: but it was demolifhed by Gabinus, in the war with Ariſtobolus, ſaith Iofephus. It was thither (ſaith Iofephus) that Herod ſent Iohn Baptiſt, and wherein hee was ſlaine: his armie ſooner after being vterly ouerthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himſelfe after this murder neuer proſpering. Not farre from Macherus was Boſor or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and nere it Linias vpon Jordan, which Herod built in honour of Linia the mother of Tiberius Caſar.

To the North of Linias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Iſrael embraced the daughters of Midian, or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Coſbi, with his ſpeare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midſt of their ſinne: and from hence Ieſua ſent the Diſcouerers to view Ierico, ſtaying heere vntill hee went ouer Jordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Ioa. 3. 18. irrigabit torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarum: and Iunius quallem Cedrorum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iuſt being placed, grow as the Cedars, Pſal. 92. 13.

The plaine Country herabout, by Mofes called The Plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the ſame book preciſely bounded by Mofes. On the South it had the great Deſert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the Eaſt it had Chaiſeroth, & Dizahab (of which the former is that Gazorum, of which Ptolomie in Paſſina, the later was Traci be- longing to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petraea, where was Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medaua and Medaba. On the Weſt it had Jordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuteron. 1. 1.) the ſame which the Geographers call Libias: and ſome confound it with Linias, of which euen now wee ſpake.

Alſo on the ſame North ſide towards the confines of Caleſyria, it had Theophel: where about ſometime Pella of Caleſyria ſtood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus ſaith, was ſometime called Busis. It is alſo noted in Mofes to be once againſt the necre vnto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as alſo Numb. 2. 14. it tranſlateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to ſignifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is ſo to be taken, with the double of Mara, thereby to diſtinguiſh it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtleſſe was about theſe Plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Country, being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as alſo the dead Sea was called Atare Suph, for like reaſon.

The place in theſe large plaines of Moab, where Mofes made thoſe diuine exhortations, ſome ſay was Reithabara where Iohn baptiz'd, which in the ſtorie of Gedeon is called Reith-bara. Iofephus ſaies it was where after the Citie Abila ſtood, necre Jordan, in a place ſet with Palmes trees: which here was the ſame as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, Numb. 33. 49. (that ſome call Abel ſathaim and Bel ſathim) which is reckoned by Mofes in that place of Numbers for the 42. and laſt place of the Iſraelites incamping in the time of Mofes: This place is alſo called Sittim; which word if we ſhould interpret, we ſhould rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Towards the Eaſt of theſe plaines of Moab, they placeth the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Mon, Sibma and Heſbon the chiefe Citie of Sehon, and Elahab, and Kiriathaim the ſeat of the Girgites Emim. Of theſe two firſt of theſe Mofes ſeemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: becauſe they taſted of the Moabit * Idolatrie. For Nebo (inſtead of which Iunius, Eſſ. 46. 1. reads Deus vaticinus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-meon is the habitation of Baal. Of the ſame Idoll was the Hill Nebo in theſe parts ſo denominat: from whoſe top, which the common Tranſlators call Phaſgah, Adrichomius ſaies before his death ſaw all the Land of Canaan beyond Jordan. In which ſtorie Iunius doth not take Phaſgah or Piſga, for any proper name: but for an appellative, ſignifying a Hill: and ſo alſo Parabulus in ſome places; as Numb. 21. 20. where hee north that ſome call Piſga that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be ſomewhat ſtrengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Iud. 13. 20. called Abidath-Piſga, which is as much as decurſus Piſga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Piſga. In the ſame place of Ieſua there is alſo named Beith-poor, as be-

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

There were beſides theſe diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongſt which they place Gallim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michal from Dauid: but Iunius thinks this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering too much out of Eſay 10. verſ. 29. where it is named among the Cities of Beniamin. With better reaſon perhaps out of Numb. 21. v. 19. wee may ſay that Mathana and Nahaliel were in thoſe confines of Reuben: through which places the Iſraelites paſt after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the reſt of the Cities of Moab.

Hierem. 47.

Midian alſo is found in theſe parts, the chiefe Citie of the Midianites in Moab: but not that Midian or Midian by the Red Sea; wherein Iethro inhabited. For of the Midianites there were two Nations, of which theſe of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thouſand Iſraelites, ſent by Mofes out of the plaines of Moab: at ſuch time as Iſrael began to accompany their Daughters: their ſue Kings with Balaam the Soothſayer were then ſlaine: and their Regall Citie with the reſt deſtroyed. The other Midianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Prieſt, forgot not the God of Abraham their Anceſtor; but relieued & aſſiſted the Iſraelites in their painfull trauals, through the Deſerts: and were in all that paſſage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and ſometime reckoned as the chiefe City of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Sela, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was alſo called totheel, as appeares by the place 2. Reg. 14. It was built (ſaith Iofephus) by Rekem, one of thoſe ſue Kings of the Midianites ſlaine as before is ſaid: after whom it was called Rekem: Now they ſay it is called Crac and Mozera. The Soldans of Aegypt, for the exceeding ſtrength thereof, kept therein all their treaſures of Aegypt and Arabia: of which it is the firſt and ſtrongest Citie: the ſame perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabatheia, whence alſo the Province adioyning tooke name: which name ſeemes to haue been taken at firſt from Nabath the ſonne of Abraham by Keſura. For Nabatheia is no where vnderſtood for all Arabia Petraea, (at leaſt where it is not miſ-underſtood) but it is that Province which neighboureth Iudea. For Pharan inhabited by Iſmael, whoſe people Ptolomie calleth Pharanites, in ſtead of Iſmaelites, and all thoſe Territories of the Cuſites, Midianites, Amalekites, Iſmaelites, Edomites, or Idumeans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hus, Sin, and of Og King of Biſan, were parts of Arabia Petraea: though it be alſo ſaid, that ſome part of Arabia the Deſert belonged to the Amalekites, and Iſmaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the firſt of Chronicles the fifth calls Hagarims of Hagar.

In the meantime when the Chriſtians held the Kingdome of Ieruſalem, it had a Latine Biſhop, hauing before been vnder the Greeke Church. It is ſcated not far from Ilor where Aaron died, & on the other ſide towards the North is the ruine of Zared or Zered, by which Mofes incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichomius deſcribeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betwene Zared and Arnon: and to hee doth the Valley of Saua: but the waters of Ninura, or Beth-Ninura (for which it comes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) reſeth the plaines of Moab: and the confluence of thoſe waters of Ninura are in the Tribe of Gad. Saua alſo cannot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, & vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the purſuit of the Aſſyrian and Perſian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Saua, or Sauah, which is the Kings Dale, where Abſalom ſet vp his Monument, as it ſeemes, not farre from Ieruſalem. And at the ſame time Melchizedec King of Salem alſo also incountred him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Bethsin otherwise Seythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hierusalem (both places lying to the West of Jordan) could not incountre each other in Arabia: and therefore Saua, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

†. II. III.
Of the Dead Sea.

NOW because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the Salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) also to the Sea of the Wildernesse, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Iosephus makes 180. furlongs (which make 22. miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But those that haue of late yeeeres seene this Sea, did account it (saith Weyssenburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirte of ours in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, specie maris, sapore corruptior, grauitate odoris accolis pestifer: neq. vento impellitur, neq. pisces aut suetus aquis volucres patitur, incertum unde superiecta ut solido feruntur, perit imperitij, nandi perinde atolluntur. Etc. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borders. It is neither moued nor raised by the winde: nor indureth fish to live in it, or fowle to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the vnskillfull of swimming, as well as the skillfull, are borne vpon by this water. At one time of the yere it casteth vpon Bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vied in the trimming of ships, and the like busineses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not farre from this Lake, which were sometime fruitfull and adorned with great Cities were burnt with lightning, of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face, as hauing lost her fruitfullnesse; for whatsoever doth either grow or is let thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they come to ripenesse, haue nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus saith Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the banks of this cursed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-side, but being cut haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake casteth vp, it was by the Greekes called Asphaltis, respasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who were not onely vnskillfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behind them, and notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not sink.

†. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Country within Arnon Reuben posselt.

OF the Kings of Moab, whose Country (within Arnon) Reuben posselt (though not taken from Moab but fro Sehon the Amorite) few are known. Iunius in the 21. of Numbers, vers. 14. nameth Labab, which seems to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balaam, the son of Zippor: which Balaam sent for Balaam to curse Israel. For fearing to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams cursings or enchantments, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases; And though Balaam at the first, moued by the spirit of God, left Israel contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to doe him seruice, he aduised Moab to send Madianitish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatrie of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his cuill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that wee finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Chozeba, and Iosab, and Sareph,

Sareph, all being of the issue of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hæc prius fuerunt, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posterity chuse rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eightene yeeeres: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made Warre, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moabite was an enemy to Saul, he receiued Dauid, and releued him; knowing that Saul fought his life.

After this, Dauid himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of Dauid, Moab is my wash-pot, ouer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumæans.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name liueth, was Mefba: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the feuerie of Dauid) fastened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: who revolted againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Iehoram: with whom ioyned the Kings of Iuda & Idumæa: and being by these three Kings prest and broken, hee fledde to Kir-hareseth, as is elsewhere shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumæans, invaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some priuate quarrels among themselves, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumæans, and slaughtered them: and then once againe another, so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victory ouer them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is not named, which was after Mefba of Hierem. Moab many decents: for Mefba liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, fourteene Kings of Iuda conning betweene, who wasted three hundred and odd yeeeres.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

THE Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioyned to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Aroer. Of the children of Gad the seventh son of Isaac by Gen. 30. Zelpha, the hand-maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Desarts, 45550. and of their sonnes there entered the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the Riuer of Iaboc diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Hebron, Elhele, and Aphec.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Aroer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rabbath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab harahero, quæ est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Chittite ipsa quæ est in flumine; Where the Citie in the Riuer is distinguished from the Citie vpon the bankes of the Riuer, (as also in like manner Ios. 12. v. 2. and e. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Harober which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they built it) was indeede seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuerse from it. For that Har was neuer posselt by Moses, it is plaine Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the Riuer of Arnon (and so distinguished from Harober, which is said in the same places to be on the bankes of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius prooueth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to be diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Ios. 13. 25. where Harober is said to be seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah as it seemes, cannot bee the Rabbah.

Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they feare not Harober neere it, nor in fight of it) and therefore by Rabbah here we must vnderstand Rabbah of Moab, which they make to be Aror Har: and so we must needs distinguish it from Harober. And as for Har (which allo gaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes in the possession of the Mosabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlomer and his Associates: but Harober by the interchange of times suffered many notable changes, as being wonne from the Mosabites by Sehon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greatest part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, in which Lot saved himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was therefore called Vitula conuersans, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thrice overthrowne with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierome seemes to thinke that this Zoar was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had been a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 14.2.) and Salissa which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quakes.

Brochard takes Harober to be Petra, but erroneously, as before it is noted; seeing that Petra was in the South border of Moab, adioyning to Edom, whereas Harober is in the North-east border. Betwene Harober and Jordan they feate Dibon, which is attributed to the Gadites, because they are said to haue built it, Numb. 32.34. though Iosua 13.20 vers. 17. it is said that Moses gaue it to the Reubenites. Of this Citie among the rest of Moab, both Esay and Hieremie prophesied, that it should perishe: and the Lakes about it runne with the blood of the Inhabitants. It was a great Village neere Arnon in Saint Hieromes time.

Keeping the banks of Arnon, one of the next Cities of fame to Arzer, was Bethnimrah, of which Esay prophesieth. That the waters thereof should be dried up: and all the vale of Moab withered. Not farre from Bethnimrah in this Tribe Adrichomius placeth Jobeba, and Nobach or Nobe: of both which we reade in the storie of Gedeon: and that Jobeba was in Gad, built by the Gadites, it appeares, Numb. 32.35. and therefore Nobachallo must needs be in these parts; but whether in Gad or Manasse it is not certaine: only that it was anciently called Kenath, Moses witnesseth. Nobachallo (saith hee) went and tooke Kenath with her Townes, and called it Nobach of his owne name, where because the verbes precedent speake of the Atansites, and because it is not likely that Moses would haue frequented this feate of the Gadites from the rest, of which he spake before, Num. 32.35. therefore it may seeme that this Nobach was in than part of Manasse, which was in the East of Jordan: though Adrichomius place it in Gad. For whereas hee supposeth it to bee the same with Nobe, which Saul destroyed, of this we shall speake in the Tribe of Beniamin. And as for that Karkor where Zebach and Salmunah rested themselves in their flight from Gedeon, to which place Gedeon marched through this Nabach and Jobeba, though some place it in Gad, and make it the same with Kir-chares, of which Esay 15. and 2. Reg. 3.25. yet there can be no certainty that it was in Gad: and if it be the same with Kir-chares, it is certaine that it was a principall Citie held still by the Mosabites, and not in the Tribe of Gad.

In the body of this Tribe of Gad they place Hataroth: of which name the Scripture witnesseth that two Cities were builded by the Gadites; the former simply called Hataroth, the later Hataroth-Sophan: for which later the Vulgar maketh two Cities, Roth and Sophan: the name Hataroth, is as much as Corone.

In the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon, together with Bethnimrah, of which we haue spoken, Iosua. cap. 13. v. 27. nameth Beth-haram and Succoth: the former, Numb. 32.36. (where it is called Beth-haram) together with Bethnimrah, is said to haue been builded by the Gadites, which (perhaps the rather, because in Iosua it is called Beth-Haram,) some take to be Retarampitha, (of which Iosuephus after by Herod called Iulias. But whether this Retarampitha were corrupted from Beth-Haram, or from Beth-Aramathas (of which Aramathas there is mention in Iosuephus) or from Beth-Ramphan (of which Ramphan, an Idoll of those Countries, we reade, Acts 7.43. and to which Iunius referres the name of the Citie Rephan, 1. Machab. 37.) of this question it were hard to resolve. But touching Iulius (according to Iosuephus sometimes Retarampitha) the same Iosuephus placeth in the Region of Peraa, beyond Jordan, which Regio Peraa, as the Greeke word signifieth, is no more then Regio ultra, or, the Countrey beyond the River; and therefore they which labour to set downe the bounds of this Peraa, take more paines then needes. Fourteene Villages this Iulias had belonging vnto it, according to Iosuephus. He makes it to haue bene built by Herod Antipas, and named Iulias, in honour of the adoption of Linia, Augustus his Wife, into the Indian family: by which adoption she was called India. Another Iulias, hee saith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gallanitis, which, he saith, is the same as Bethsaida.

Vpon the Sea of Gallilee neere to Iulias in Peraa, (that is, in the Region ouer Jordan) they finde Petecobria, as it is called in Iosuephus, for Beth-ecob, which is as much as domus Of a noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hierusalem, and was there besieged, Iosuephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger she ate her owne childe, with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

Of Succoth (which we said Ios. 13. is placed with Ben-haran, in the Valley of the Kingdome of Sehon) it is plaine by the story of Gedeon that it is neere vnto Jordan: where it is said, that as he was past Jordan with his three hundred, wearie in the pursuit of Zebach and Salmunah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gideons returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threshing Carre of Tribulum, betwene which and their flesh he put Thornes to reare their flesh as they were preft and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which sort also Dauid vfed some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with yron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in haste, either for Men or Cattell, Moses, Gen. 33.17. witnesseth that the original of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Ramesses in Aegypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vfed after for forty yeeres in the Wilderness. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

Other foure Cities of Gad are named, Ios. 12.38. Ramoth in Gilehad, Machanaïm, Cheshbon, and Lahzer, all of them by the Gadites giuen to the Leuites, of which Lahzer, as Cheshbon or Hebron was a chiefe Citie of Sehon, whence Num. 32.1. his Countrey is called the Land of Lahzer. It was taken by Moses, hauing first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilehad. In latter times (as it may be gathered by the prophetic of Esay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Mosabites: to which place of Esay also Hieremie in a like prophetic alludes. It was at length regained (but as it seemes from the Ammonites) by Iudas Maccabeus: as it is 1. Macc. 5.8. where Iunius out of Iosuephus reads Lahzer though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gezer (as he gathereth out of Iosua 16.3. and Ind. 1.29.) was fure from these Countreys of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Aegypt wan it from the Canaanites, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

Of Cheshbon it may be maruelled that in the place of Iosua, and 1. Chron. 6.81. it should be said to haue bene giuen to the Leuites by the Gadites, seeing Iosua 13.27. it is reckoned for a principall Citie of the Reubenites: Adrichomius and such as little trouble themselves with such scruples, finding Cashon, 1. Macc. 5.36. among the Cities of Gilehad, taken by Iudas Maccabeus, makes two Cities of one: as if this Cashon had bene the Cheshbon of Gad: and that of Reuben distinct from it: but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betwene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machanaïm, which word signifieth a double Armie, we reade Gen. 32.2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Hoste or company, to ioyne with his for his defence: as also Luke 2.13. we reade of a multitude of the Hoste of Heauen, which appeared to the sheepe-herds, at the time of our Saviours birth: and so vnto the Godly King Ofwald of Northumberland, when hee was soone after to ioyne battaile with the Pagan Penda of North-Englad, Beđa reports, that the like comfort appeared: whence the field where the Bataille was fought in the North-parts of England, is called Heaven-field. In this Citie of Machanajon David abode during the rebellion of Abisalom: and the same for the strength thereof Abner chose for the feat of Ishboiseth, during the warre betwene David and the house of Saul.

Battaile

Of the fourth Towne which was Ramoth in Gilead, we read often in the Scripture, for the recovering of which King Achab lost his life. Iunius thinks that Ramath-Mispe, of which Iosias 13.26. was this Ramoth in Gilead. Concerning the place where Laban and Jacob sware one to the other, as it was called Gilead, which is as much as a witnessing heape, because of the heape of Stones which Laban and his sonnes left for a monument; so also that it was called Misphab, which signifieth ouer-looking (because there they called God to ouer-see and be witnesse to their covenant) it is plaine by the place, Gen. 31.49. that in these parts there was not onely a Towne, but likewise a Region called Mispha, it appears, Ios. 11.3. where we read of the Chinuites vnder Herman, in the Countrie of Mispha, *the Towne of Mispha, as it seemes both by this place, and in the eight verse following, being not in the Hill Countrie, but in the valley. But seeing that Iephia the Iudge of Israel, who after he came home from Tob, (whither his brethren had druen him) dwelt in this Towne of Mispha, who doubtlesse was of the Tribe of Manasse, and thence at first expelled by his brethren, it may seeme that they doe not well which place this Towne of Mispha rather in Gad, than in Manasse. By Iudas Machabeus this Towne of Mispha (whether in Gab or in Manasse) was utterly spoiled and burnt, and males of it slaine: for it was then posselt of the Ammonites.

Betweene Succoth (of which we haue spoken) and the Riuer Iaboc was that Penid or Pennid, which name signifieth Locum faciei Dei; A place where the face of God was scene: so called for memorie of the Angels appearing to Jacob, and wrestling with him there: the churlishnesse of which Citie, in refusing to relieue Gideon, was the cause that in his returne he ouerthrew their Towre, and slew the chiefe Aldermen thereof. To these places of the Gadites, then adde Rogelim, the Citie of that great and faithfull subiect Burghillat, as it seemes, not farre from Mithanama, where he sustained King David, during Abisaloms rebellion. To these they adde the Towne of Gaddi, Arnon, & Alimis, of which Gaddi, being in Hebrew no more then Gaddita, is ignorantly made a name of a place: Arnon alio where appears to be the name of a Towne, but still of a Riuer. Alimis Adrichomius frames of Alimus, 1 Mac. 5.26. so that the name should rather be Alema, but Iunius out of Iosephus reads Malle, for this in Alimis: and vnderstanding Malle to be put for Attilo, and to be as much as Munitio, (as we haue shewed touching the Attilo of the Sichemites) hee takes this Malle, to bee Mispha Moabitarum, of which 1 Sam. 22.5. As for that Magelb which Adrichomius findes in this Tribe of Gad, it is that Mabacath, which Moses noteth to be as farre as the furthest of Manasses, out of the bounds of this Tribe. So also Dathema, of which 1 Mac. 5.10. (which Iunius takes to be a Rithma, of which Numb. 33.18. a place of strength in the Territorie of the Ammonites) and in like manner Minnith, and Abel vncarum, though by some they be attributed to the Gadites, or to their borders, yet they are found farther off. For of the two last we read in Iephia 3. in pursuit of the Ammonites: seated as it seemes by that place of the booke of Iudges, the former of them in the South border, and the other of them in the East border, both farre removed from the Gadites. But the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites was neuer, and not farre from the borders of Gad. It is called in the Scriptures sometime Rabbath, as Deut. 3.11. but more often Rabba. It is supposed to be that * Philadelphia which Ptolomee findes in Calofrya. Hierome and Callistus in Arabia. It was conquered by Og from the Ammonites: but as it seemes neuer posselt by the Israelites, after the ouerthrow of Og, but left to the Ammonites: whereupon at length became the Regall seat of the Ammonites, but of old it was the possession of the Zamzummins: which is as much to say, as men for all manner of craft and wickednesse infamous. The same were also called Raphaim, of whom was Og, which recovered much of that which the Ammonites had got from his Ancestors: who hauing beene first beaten by the Affryans, and their assistants (as the Emims in Moab, and the Horims in Sar had beene) were afterward the easier conquered by the Ammonites, as the Emims were by Moab, and the Horims by the Idumeans. Yet did the races of Emoreus, of whom these Giants were descended, contend with the Conquerours for their ancient inheritance: and as Sehon of Hesbon had disposselt Moab, so had Og of Basan the Ammonites, and betwene them recovered the best part of all the Valley, betwene the Mountaines and Iordan. For this Og was also master of Rabba or Philadelphia: And in the possession of the one or of the other of these two, Moses and Israel found all those Cities and Countreies which were giuen to Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse. So that though it were 450. yeeres since that these Zamzummins or Raphaims were expelled, yet they did not forget their ancient inheritance: but hauing these two Kings of one kindred, and both valiant and vndertaking men, to wit, Og and Sehon, both Amorites, they recovered againe much of their lost possessions, and thrust the sonnes of Lot ouer the mountaines, and into the Desarts. And as the Kings or Captaines of Persia and Affrya, (remembered in the 14. of Genesis) made way for Ammon, Moab, and Edom, so by that great conquest which Moses had ouer those two Amorites, Og and Sehon, did the Moabites and Ammonites take opportunitie to looke backe againe into those plaines; and when the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites forsooke the worship of the liuing God, and became sloathfull and licentious, they taking the advantage inuaded them, and cast them out of their possessions: and were sometime their masters, sometime their tributaries, as they pleased or displeased God. and according to the wisdom and vertue of their Commanders.

In this Citie of Rabba, was the yron bed of Og found, nine cubites of length, and foure of breadth. The Citie was taken in Dauids time, and the inhabitants slaine with great seuerity, and by diuers torments. At the first assault thereof Vrias was shot to death, hauing beene by direction from David appointed to be employed in the leading of an assault, where he could not escape: wherein also many of the best of the Armie perished: and wherein David lo displeased God, as his affaires had ill successe afterward, euen to his dying day. From hence had David the weighty and rich crowne of gold, which the Kings of Ammon ware: or which as some expound it, was vfed to be put on the head of their Idoll, waighing a talent, which is 60. pound waight after the common talent. In the time of Christians it had a Metropolitan Bishop, and vnder him twelue others.

The Mountaines which are described within this Tribe, and that of Manasse, with a part of Reuben, are those that Ptolomee calleth the hills of Hippus: a Citie of Calofrya: and Strabo * Trachones: the same which continue from neere Damascus vnto the Desarts of Moab: and receiue diuers names, as commonly mountaines doe, which neighbour and bound diuers Countreies: for from the South part, as farre Northwards as Affrothy, the chiefe Citie of Og, they are called Galaad or Gilead; from thence Northward they are knowne by the name of Herman, for so Moses calleth them: The Sidonians name them Shirion, but the Amorites Shenir, others Seir: of which name all those Hills also were called, which part Iudea and Iudaea: and lastly, they are called Libanus, for so the Prophet Hieremie makes them all one, calling the high mountaines of Galaad, the head of Libanus. These mountaines are very fruitfull, and full of good pastures, and haue many trees which yeelde Balsamum, and many other medicinall drugs. The Riuer of this Tribe are the waters of Nimrah, and Dibon, and the Riuer Iaboc: Others doe also fancie another Riuer, which rising out of the Rockes of Arnon, falleth into Iordan.

§. VI.

Of the Ammonites, part of whose Territories the Gadites wanne from Og the King of Basan.

His Tribe of Gad posselt halfe the Countrie of the Ammonites, who together with the Moabites, held that part of Arabia Petraea called Nabathæa, as well within as without the mountaines of Gilead: though at this time when the Gadites wanne it, it was in the possession of Sehon and Og, Amorites: and therefore Moses did not expell the Ammonites, but the Amorites, who had thrust the issues of Lot ouer the mountaines Trachones or Gilead, as before. After the death of Othoniel the first Iudge of Israel, the Ammonites ioyned with the Moabites against the Hebrewes, and so continued long. Iephia Iudge of Israel had a great conquest ouer one of the Kings of Ammon, but his name is omitted. In the time of Samuel they were at peace with them againe.

Afterward we finde that cruell King of the Ammonites, called Nabab: who besieging Iaboc Gilead, gaue them no other conditions but the pulling out of their right eyes. The reason why he rendered so hard a composition, was (besides this desire to bring shame shame vpon Israel because those Gileadites vsing to carry a Target on their left armes, which could not but shadow their left eyes, should by losing their right, be vtterly disabled to defend themselves: but Saul came to their rescue, and deliuered them from that danger. This Nabaz, as it may seeme, became the confederate of Dauid, hauing friended him in Sauls time, though Iosephus thinks that this Nabaz was slaine in the battaile, when Saul raised the siege of Tubes, who affirmeth that there were three Kings of the Moabites of that name.

Hannu succeeded Nabaz: to whom when Dauid sent to congratulate his establishment, and to confirme the former friendship which he had with his Father, he most contemptuously and proudly cut off the Ambassadors garments to the knees, and shaued the halfe of their beards. But afterward notwithstanding the aydes receiued from the Ammonites subiect to Adadzeor, and from the Reguli of Rehob, and Maacab, and from Israhel, yet all those Arabians, together with the Ammonites, were ouer-turned: their chiefe Citie of Rabbah, after Philadelphus was taken, the Crowne which weighed a talent of gold was set on Dauids head, all such as were prisoners, Dauid executed with strange severity; for with Sawes and Harrowes hee tare them in pieces, and cast the rest into Lime-kils.

Iosaphat gouerning Juda, they assited the Moabites their neighbours against him, and perished together. Osias made them Tributaries, and they were againe by Ioham inforced to continue that Tribute, and to increase it, to wit, a hundredth talents of siluer, ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley: which the Ammonites continued two yeeres.

The first King of the Ammonites, of whose name we read, was Baalis, the confederate of Zedechias: after whose taking by Nabuchodonosor, Balis sent Ismael of the blood of the Kings of Juda, to slay Gedaliah, who serued Nabuchodonosor.

§ VII.

Of the other halfe of Manasse.

He rest of the Land of Gilead, and of the Kingdome of Og in Basjan, with the Land of Ites, and Argob, or Trachonitis (wherein also were part of the small Territories of Butana, Ganlonitis, Gessuri, Mathati, and Auranitis) was given to the h. Tribe of Manasse ouer Jordan, of which those three latter Prouinces defended themselves against them, for many ages. But Butana Ptolomie stretch further off, and to the North-East, as a skirt of Arabia the Desert: and all those other Prouinces before named with Petræa, and Turea, he nameth but as part of Calofyria: as farre South as Rabbah or Philadelpia: likewise all the rest which belonged to Gad, and Reuben, sauing the Land nere the Dead Sea, he maketh a part of Arabia Petræa: for many of these small Kingdomes take not much more ground then the Countie of Kent.

Basjan, or after the Septuagint, Basanitis, stretcheth it selfe from the Riuer of Iaboc to the Atchatri and Gessuri: and from the Mountaines to Jordan, a Region exceeding fertile: by reason whereof it abounded in all sorts of Cattell. It had also the goodliest Woods of all that part of the world: especially of Oakes, which beare mast of which the Prophet Zacharias, Howle, O ye Oakes of Basjan, and by reason hereof they bred so many Swine, as 2000. in one Herd were carried head-long into the Sea, by the vncleane spirits which Christ had cast out of one of the Gadarens. It had in it threefore Cities walled and defended: all which, after Og and his sonnes were slaine, Jair, descended of Manasse, conquered, and called the Countie after his owne name, Aunah Jair, or the Cities of Jair.

The principall Cities of this halfe Tribe (for I will omit the rest) are these, Pella sometimes Butis, otherwise Berenice; by Selencus King of Syria, it is said to haue bene called Pella, after the name of that Pella in Macedon: in which both Philip the Father, and his Sonne Alexander the Great were borne. It was taken, and in part demolished by Alexander Lameus King of the Tewes: because it refused to obey the Tewes lawes: but it was repaired by Pompey, and annexed to the Gouernement of Syria. It is now but a Village, saith Niger. Carnaim by the Riuer of Iaboc, taken by Indas Maccabeus: where he ser on fire the Temple of their Idols: together with all those that fled thercunto for Sanctuary; and nere it they place the Castle of Carnion, of which 2 Macc. 12. 22. Thence the strong Citie of Ephron nere Jordan: which refusing to yeelde passage to Indas Maccabeus, was forced by him by assault, and taken and burnt with great slaughter.

Tubes Gilead, or Tubese, was another of the Cities of this halfe Tribe, which being besieged by Nabaz King of the Ammonites, was deliuered by Saul, as is elsewhere mentioned. In memory whereof these Citizens recovered, embalmed, and buried the bodies of Saul and his Sonnes: which hung despitfully ouer the wals of Beithsan or Scythopolis. Gadara, or Gadara, is next to be named, seated by Plinie on a Hill nere the Riuer Hieromace, which Riuer Orellus seemes to thinke to be Iaboc. At the foot of the Hill there spring forth also hot baths, as at Macharus. Alexander Lameus after ten months siege wane it, and subuerued it. Pompey restored it: and Gabinus made it one of the five Courts of Iustice in Palestine. Hierusalem being the first, Gadara the second, Emath or Amathus the third, Hierico, and Sephora in Galilee, the fourth and fift. The Citizens impatiently bearing the tyranny of Herod, surnamed Ascalonitis, accused him to Iulius Cæsar of many crimes: but perceiving that they could not preuaile, and that Herod was highly fauoured of Cæsar, fearing the terrible reuenge of Herod, they slew themselves: some by strangling, others by leaping ouer high Towers, others by drowning themselves.

To the East of Gadara they place Sebei, in which, Iosephus ant. 5. 12. saith Leptis was buried: whence others reading with the Vulgar, Iud. 12. 7. Sepulchrum est in Ciuitate sua G. I. Iud. (for in una Ciuitate Gilead) imagine Gilead to be the name of a Citie, and to be the same with Sebei. In like manner following the Vulgar, 1 Macc. 5. 26. where it readeth Casphor for Chesbon; the same Adrichomius imagineth it to be ample Es firma Gileaditarum. Cinias so of one Citie Hebron or Chesbon, which they call Esfebon, the chiefe Citie of Sehon, in the Tribe of Reuben, hee imagineth two more: this Casphor in Manasse, and a Citie in Gad which he calleth Casbon, of which we haue aduised the Reader heretofore. Of Gamala (so called, because the Hill on which it stood, was in fashion like the backe of a Cammell), which Iosephus placeth not farre from Gadara, in the lower Gaulanitis ouer against Tarichea, which is on the West side of the Sea or Lake of Tiberias, seeth this Iosephus in the fourth booke of the Iewish warre: where hee describeth the place by nature to be almost inuincible: and in the storie of the siege, shewes how Iosephus with much danger of his owne person, entering it, was at first repulld, with other very memorable accidents: and how at length after the coming of Titus, when it was taken, many leaping downe the rockes with their wiues and children, to the number of five thousand, there perished: besides foure thousand slaine by the Romans: so that none escaped, save only two women that had themselves.

About foure miles West from Gadara, and as much East from Tiberias (which is on the other side of the Lake) Iosephus placeth Hippus or Hippene, whence Ptolomie giues the name to the hills that compass the plaines in which it standeth: so that it may seeme to haue bene of no small note. It is seated farre from the hill Countie: on the East of the Lake, as also Plinie noteth Iub. 5. cap. 15. It was restored by Pompey: after by Augustus added to Herods Tetrarchie: It was wasted by the Iewes, in the beginning of their rebellion: when by many massacres of their Nation, they were incraged against their borderers.

Thence next Citie of note, but of more ancient fame, is Edrchi or Edrai, wherein Og King of Basjan chiefly abode, when Moses and Israel invaded him: and nere vnto this his Regall Citie, it was that he lost the battaile and his life. It stood in S. Hierome time: and had the name of Adar or Adara. Not farre from these Townes nere Jordan, in this valley stood Gersa or Gergeffa, inhabited by the Gergesites, descended of the fift sonne of Canaan. Of these Gergesites we read Mat. 8. 28. that Christ coming from the other side of the Lake of Tiberias, landed in their coasts: where casting the Diuels out of the possessed, hee permitted them to enter into the herd of Hogges: in which storie, for Gergesites or Gergesins, S. Luke and S. Marke haue Gadarens: not as if these were all one (for Gergeffa or Gersa is a distinct Towne in these parts from Gadara) but the boynds being confounded, and the Cities neighbours, either might well be named in this story. This Citie receiued many changes and calamities: of which Iosephus hath often mention.

tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annus Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In the yeere 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same yeere recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Hierusalem: and by him viceroy razed. Neere vnto Gerazi is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriack Mageda, or after the Greeke Magdala, where the Pharisee and Sadducees defied of our Saviour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adioyning roit, which S. Marke calleth Dalmannutha. By the circumstances of which storie it appears that this coast lay betwene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countrie of Decapolis. Brochard makes both these places to be one, and findes it to be Phale, the fountaine of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phale is too farre from the Sea to of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to be either Magdala or Dalmannutha. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desart of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five Barley loaves and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compassed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Iturae and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberius, called Julias, as hath beene farther spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Julias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corazim, of which Christ in Mat. 23 saith: Woe be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giantes Raphaim: and therefore the Countrie adioyning called the Land of Giantes, of whose race was Og, King of Basán. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth Carnaim, whence 1. Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim signifieth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the Image of a sheepe as it is elsewhere noted, that Asteroth in Idolatrie signifieth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Karnaim, to have beene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heros radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 11. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words, Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Raphaim: but if the Karnaim (or Carnaim) were these Raphai, the word would not have beene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis have said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Karnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittest for periphrasie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguisheth one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Abirchomius out of Brochard and Brudenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure miles from Corazim. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Iudith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand Dauid in his 120. Psalme: and herethe Sepulchre of Iob is yet to be seene, saith Brudenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vñe in that place of Iudith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not hercabour, than any way helpe Abirchomius. For that they speake of Scenitis Cedar, it is apparent, and as euident by the place in the Canticles that they were decolor, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) so saue many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historical circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countrie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countrie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe, whether he was the same Iobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Esaus, and King also of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyrannus, Oleaster, and Belarmine are of another opinion, yet S. Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregory, with with Athanasius, Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius Emisenus, Apollinaris, Eustachius and other, cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epist. to Euagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke Ὠς, which the Septuaginta vñe for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. Sometime Ausius, as Hierom. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palastina and Celestria, belides Chamatha (or Himath) vnder Palmyrene in the Countrey called by Ptoleme Trachonitis or Bathanea, the bounds of which Countreies are confounded with Basán in this halfe Tribe of Manassas. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in some part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. 20. where he reckons the Habshites among the promiscuous borderers of the Israhelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneus turbam, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Ieremie, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same prophetic, of which hee speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, must needs be expounded: as Iunius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, quae habitas in terra Hus; O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth Filia Edom quae habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as we haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by it Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Edumaea. For it is very probable that Esaus when he first parted from Israhel, did not seate himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lieth on the South border of Iudaea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines otherwise called Galaad, and Herman, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shenir for Seir; and from this his habitation did Esaus encounter Israhel when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Esaus his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Esaus inhabited Seir to the South of Iudaea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Moab, did also drue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward seated themselves to the South of Iudaea, bordering the Desart Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Deserts as farre as Hur where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinks in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23, or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue beene lost: and partly because in Iob 6. 32. 2. Elibu the fourth of Iobs friends, which seemes to be of Iobs owne Countrey, is whence the Syriack calleth him regionis Auside, called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the sonne of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betwene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elibu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Aram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Scm, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iobs friends (which must beed be this Elibu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as he readeth not 2 familiam Aram, or Ram, but 2 familiam Syria; like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iobs friends (of whom by this note of Elibu his being of the Syrian Familie, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is implied that they were of other kindred, as also by the Septuaginta addition, that this Elibu was of the Land of Hus, or Auside, it is implied that they thought only Elibu to haue beene of Iobs owne Countrie.

Franciscus Brochard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iourne from Acon Eastward, findeth Sueiba, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both vñe neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite; the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinks that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desart, descended of Shuach the sonne of Abraham and Keura: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Saccas. So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom

K k

Eliphaz

Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Desert: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue beene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Efan. And so also Nabamah, whence Tjophar the third of Iobs friends (which in this place of Iob c. 2. v. 11. are mentioned) is by the same learned expolitor, thought either to be named of Thimnath by transposition of letters (which Thimnath, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Esauch that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated or else to be the same Nabamah, which Iof. 15. 41. is reckoned for a Citie of Juda in the border, as he thinks, of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hus, in Basjan, as it seems, in the Tribe of Manasse, there is a Region which at least in later times was called Suita, or of some like name. For this is euidet by the Historie of Willichmus Tyrinus, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suita or Suites (as he calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vnk for the retaining of the whole Countrey: which, in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians: hauing not long before beene lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrey, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrinus described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasse named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behel, Thera, Misspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nabach. Of Nabach or Kenath, and Misspa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Iosephus. Behel or Thera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basjan by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Beiser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iofia) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This Lake being as it were in the midst betwene Cæsarea Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brocard: otherwise more con- tract, leauing the marsh ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manasse, Iosephus names two places of strength, fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Iewes rebellion: Seleucia the one, and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauram, and Chatfar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West, of which three Cities we read Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauram, between Tsedad, and Chatfar-Henan, Zipbron is named. From this Chauram is the name of Auruntia regio, in Iosephus and Tyrinus, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Mahab chasb or Masatir, which were likewise borderers to Manasse toward the North-east) are vnknowne: onely that Gessur was of might, it appears in that Danid married Mahab the Daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautifull, but wicked, and vnfortunate Abfalon.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus, and the diuers fortunes thereof.

*D*amascus of all other in this Border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in beautie, antiquitie, and riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnesse; and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue beene built by Hus the sonne of Aram: of which opinion

Iosephus 1. 4.

S. Hierome vpon Efui seemeth to be: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damisco. Danid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Juda, after the ouerthrow of Adadecer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though he had no title at all or right to that principallitie: but Danid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadezer king of Sophena (other- wise Syria Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken armie, invaded Damascena, and posselt Damascus it selfe, and became an enemie to Salomon all to his life.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from Dauid and Isab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of Egypt wifes sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became an enemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assians and then the Græcians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanah and Parphar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysorrhoea the golden iouier. Tunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitfull of excellent wines and wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, built as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the lillies being found cut in many marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets Amos, Efui, Hieremie and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon and tenth King of the Damascens, Tegulphadassar imited by Acha King of Juda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leauing of his owne nation to inhabit it. After that it was vtterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Efui: which thing was performed by Sabmasassar, according to Ianuis in his note vpon that place, fye yeeres after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: S. Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yeere of our redemption 636. And in the yeere 1147. Conrad the third, Emperour of Rome, Lewes King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbaross afterward Emperour, Theoderick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recouer Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize.

In the yeere 1262. Hilon the Tartar incompass it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the wals, and threatened extreme torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agub the sonne of Hilon was by his father made King thereof.

In the yeere 1400. Timberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the Citie with an armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken). He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: hee forbore the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. lanternes of gold and siluer: but while hee invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his returne after three months siege hee forst it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their priests, desired mercie: But Timberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, he burnt them, and it to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophy of his victorie hee raised three Towers with great Art, builded with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this it was restored and reposselt by the Soldane of Egypt, with a garrison of Mammalukes: And in the yeere 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrested it out of the hands of the Egyptians:

in whole possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mabometians, and Christians, of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hu the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eleazer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings; or Common-wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan; and therefore neglected by Moses, Iosua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Storie: But were it so that it had some reguli, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadazer prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubari, inhabiting betwene Batanea and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may informe himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadazer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the cities subiect to Adadazer when Dauid invaded him, though when Saul made warre againe Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those lie-cours, which were leuied and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadazer, Rezon, the Commander of his armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadazer and Adad of Damascus being both flaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Iuraa, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadazer was vtterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but in dolo saith S. Hierome; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Idumeans and Israhelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iuraa, to which I may adde Geshur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus (for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract.) It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, other Adad of Idumea: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing invaded that Region, and left Zobab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seede, fled into Aegypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before, who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Iosh (whom indeede all the bordering Nations feared) he returned againe, and as Banring thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as I take it, Adadazer the sonne of Echob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that Principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerful, tooke vpon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Affyrians, such Macrobis, which signified oncelle or Phutur, I also finde a Cited called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes took the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-azer, Ben-adad, Eli-adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadazer was of greatest power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid vnderooke the warre: secondly, because hee leuied 22000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions: for had the Damascians had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadazer was King, was an exceeding large Territory, and contained of Arabia the Desert as far as to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Whosoever was the first, whether Adadazer, or Adad of Idumea, Rezon was the second: Who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumea, lately returned out of Aegypt: to wit, 23. yeeres after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobab both, was Hezion, to Hezion succeeded Tabrimmon, or Tabremmon, to him Benhadad, as is proued in the list of Kings; For Afa King of Idu the son of Abiam, the son of Roboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & invaded by Bashtu, the successor of Nadab, the son of Iroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon the sonne of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Bashtu sought to fortifie Rama against Afa: thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Afa, hauing received his presents, willingly invaded the Countrey of Nepthalim, and tooke diuers Cities, and spoiles thence: Afa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Bashtu had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse.

This *Benhadad*s Father Tabremmon was in league with Afa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Afa requieth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprise of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father took from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make freetees or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samarita. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeede to Benhadad which invaded Bashtu, at the request of Afa: But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Afa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betwene the invasion of Benhadad the first, in *Bashtu*s time, and the siege of Samarita, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab, there past 49. yeeres, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeeres of age to Benhadad, when hee invaded Bashtu, and after that 49. yeeres ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is unlikely that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vaunteth, that he was followed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolve, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon invaded Bashtu and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samarita, by a fall of 700. Israhelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israhelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites; besides 27000. which were crusht by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe setteth at liberty: to whom he rendereth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilead, a frontier towne, and of great importance. Now three yeeres after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth not being deliuered, Achab invaded Gilead, and assiegeth the Citie, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet he picketh squarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence, had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After Benhadad besieged Samarita again, and being terrified thence from heaven, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successor Azael were worshipped for gods by the Syrians to his time, forth: presumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, saith he, that scarce yet 1100. yeeres are compleate since their warres with the Israhelites.

Hazael or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Eliphaz or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Ben- hadad should recover his present sickness: He waged warre with Ioram; who received divers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Isebel, he and the King of Juda, Ahabzab, or Ochozias, are slain by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azel continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse, over Jordan. He then invaded Juda, and took Geth, but by gifts from Iosias he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he preferred him all the hallowed things which Iehophat, Iehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers, Kings of Juda had dedicated; and which he himselfe had dedicated: and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Azidid to present Benhadad with those treasures, when he invited him to warre upon Baalba King of Israel. And notwithstanding this composition betwene Iosias and Azel, yet a part of his Armie spoiled the other Prouinces of Judea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azel vexed Iosias the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie as he left him but fifty horsemen, ten Chariots, & ten thousand footemen of all his people.

§. III.

Of the latter Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

AFTER Haazel, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the sonne of Haazel, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Israel, with ill success: For Iosias King of Israel, the sonne of the unhappy Joachaz, as hee was foretold by Elisha the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall battels: and hee lost all those Cities to Israel, which his Father Haazel had taken violently from Israel.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Haazel, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholaus Damascenus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Iosias recovered Damascus it selfe, so Judah, saith the Geneva, but better in hymus, virque recuperabit Damascus & Chamatham Iehuda pro Israele; that is, And how he recovered for Israel, Damascus and Chamatha of Judea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Juda.

And it is likely that this conquest upon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then living, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehosias the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Haazel, and had recovered the Cities which Haazel had won from Israel; and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and invaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Rasles after Zonaras Rasles, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekah, or Phacis King of Israel, against Achaz King of Juda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vaine. Then Adad alone invadeth Eluth and bearing out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians. Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who took him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads; and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Israel. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

- 1 Adad the sonne of Rehob.
- 2 Rezin the sonne of Elidad, or Razin.
- 3 Hezion.
- 4 Tubremmon.
- 5 Benhadad, who invaded Baalba.
- 6 Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achab.
- 7 Haazel, whom Elisha foretold, with teares, of his advancement; the same who overthrow Ioram King of Israel, at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Haazel which preceded Benhadad the third, it is not improbable, because that Haazel which took Geth, and compounded the warre with Iosias, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazel which stilled his master Benhadad, and had slain Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Israel. For Iosias began to reigne in the 7. yeere of Iehu King of Israel; and after he had reigned 27. yeeres, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazel took Geth, and turned his face towards Hierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazel that took Geth, was not the same with Hazel that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time be of good yeeres, being as it seemeth, the second person in the Kingdome, and Commander of *Benhadad*s men of warre. To this Hazel, be he the first or second, succeeded:

8. Benhadad the third, whom Iosias King of Israel thrice overthrow.
9. Rezin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekah King of Israel, against Juda, at which time Achaz King of Juda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholaus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gelsur, we finde that Tobu was King of Emath or Chamath in Dauids time, to whom he sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadezer. Also Sennacherib speaketh of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, never recovered themselves againe.

IF Gelsur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmal, and his Father Ammibur. To Talmal, whose daughter David married, it was that Abisalon fledde, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sophena or Syria, Soba or Calogryia, there are two named, Rehob or Rechob the Father of Adadezer, and Adadezer himselfe, and it is plain that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desert of Arabia with other Prouinces into one, under Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Israel. For Abaz King of Juda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekah King of Israel, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first invaded Damascus, and the region of Soba, and took Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Israel. For first, Phul Belochus entred the borders thereof (Menabem gouerning Israel) who stooped the enterprize of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Belochus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warme as yet in his state at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to be a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Israel for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his Father Belochus, and finding to excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Israel and Judah, Pekah commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapped in that warre, and wasted in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Juda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Israel, hee carried it (as is before remembered) and then with great ease possessed himselfe of the Cities of Nephthelim, leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolomie calleth Nabonassar, after the revolt of Hosea, forced Samarina, and rent the Kingdome asunder. So as the line and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Belochus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered; the Kingdome of Israel in Hosea, whom Salmanasser overturned; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Belochus, and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son. For Sardanapalus perished, Osia ruling Juda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolved, Achaz yet living.

Lastly, the Kingdome of Juda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by God miraculously, was at length utterly veterly ouerturned. Jerusalem and the Temple burnt 132. yeeeres after the captiuitie of Israel, and Sumaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeeer of Hofee: that of Iuda in the eleuth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Affysia and Babylon held alth the Kingdome of Syria, from the eight yeeer of Salmanassar, to the laft of Balsassar, whom 3603. Herodotus calleth Labyrinthus: in all about 200. yeeeres. After thefe the Persians from 3811. ru to Darius their laft King, held Syria about 200. yeeeres.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Perſian Empire, and his ſuccellores the Selewidae reigned therein, till it became ſubiect vnto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in poſſeſſion of the Turke, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. Thus much of the nations <sup>10</sup> bordering vpon the ſeafraides; with whom they had moſt to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whoſe Hiſtory in thoſe ancient times carried an afflicted face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENJAMIN,
and of Hierufalem.

§. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitispa, Bethel, Rama, Gobah and Gibha.

The Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest sonne of Jacob, whom he had by Rachel, there were muliered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 45600. fit to beare Arms: and these had their Territory on this side Jordan; betwene Jadai; and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neerest Jordan, are Lod, Hadad, and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemai a Beniamite: they were all three re-inhabited by Beminites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, N. 2.35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides iticallied Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon

Samarion or Tjemaraim, named of Tjemary, one of the fannes of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Jericho, one of the Toparchies, and the Lift of Juda, seated in a most fruitful valley, adorned with many palm trees: and there were elsewhere called the citee of Palmes. From the time of Ioiaua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste until the time of Achab: in whose dayes Chief of Bethel build the new foundation of it, in the loffe of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the loffe of his youngest sonne Sebul: according to the curse of Ioiaua: in which and other respects, Iho. 1. 2. 14. calleth Ioiaua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vespasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the South-east of Jericho stood * Halmom of the Levites, of which Iof. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Iof. c. 15, and c. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Iofua first taste of the fruits of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Deserts, and celebrated the Pasſover.

Therealson of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seems by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was known before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Iof. 5. 9. Ob deuolutionem probrī Aegypti, because their fore-skins (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called Collis praprium. This Gilgal was also called Gil-lath, as appears by comparing the places, Iof. 15. 7. and 18. 17. for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Iof. 22. 1. 3. and Gilgal signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two * Hills Garaazim and Hēbal: upon the one of which the bleeings, and on the other the eunings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Atsissa of Beniamin (of which also were read off in the Scripture) were situate about the midle of the length of the land of Canaan: for which reason Saul had chose those two places, to either of which he came yearly to giue iudgement to the Isradites; of which two, Gilgal (as is said) was neere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Atsissa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vsed yeerely to come is <sup>b</sup> Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Beniamin. But to returne to Gilead which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they passd ouer Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kirith-ibehrim, and at length to Hiersusalem) here in Gilead it was that Iosua pitched up the twelve stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which Story, as it is set down Ios. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, they lodged at Gilead. At the same Gilead, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Agag the King of the Amalekites in pieces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yeerely to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibbaj, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. 1. and another against the Philistines, 1. Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Maccabees gathered the Iewes, (when Hiersusalem was posselt by the Heathen) as it is 1. Macc. 3. 47. in which place this reason of their meeting is added, Quia locus Orationis fuerat Mitspa antea Israeli. Touching this Mitspa, to auoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Iuda, of which Ios. 15. 38. Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad: Mitspa of the Moabites, where Dauid for a while held himself, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, 1. Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hiersusalem was recovered from the Assyrians, and also in the time of the Maccabees (as we haue said) when Hiersusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Theremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Grabalath whom Nabuchodonosor left in Iewry, as Governour ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Iewes) hee was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall blood of Iuda, as it is Hierem. 41.

Neere vnto this Anfpa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hexer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel which (as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chief meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the office of Japheth (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehemiah 11.31. and 1st Jof. 18.22.) and how another Citie called Luz,<sup>a</sup> nere adjoining to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Judg. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Nichols vision: and how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it Beth-aven that is, the house of Vanitie, Hof. 4.15. and 10.5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that we may well passe them over.

The territory of Rebel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdom of the ten Tribes, from the time of the great victory of Asa against Jeroboam (of which see Chron. 13.) was taken from them, and adjoined to the Kingdom of Judah: and so it continued, as appears by the Story of Isaiah: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Rebel, 2. Reg. 23., whence those coats 1. Macc. 11. 34. are called Apharaim, which Greek word signifieth as much as, A thing taken away, to wit, from the ten Tribes. It was one of the three Sagitories or Præfectures which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Jews, out of the Samaritan Country. A part of it, as appears 2. Chron. 13. 19. was Hebephraim, which Isa. 18. 2, 3. is called Hebphaim, belonging to this Tribe to Beniamin.

Not far from this Bethel, in this Tribe, we find three other Cities often mentioned in the Scriptures. Footnote—The Scriptures mention the boundaries of the Kingdoms of Issachar and Manasse between Hai and Bethel. See Genesis 31: 2, 3, and 28: 12.

in the Scriptures, Rama, Gibba, and Gebah. Of the name Rama,<sup>b</sup> it is noted already, in the description of Ephraim, that there were many townes so called, because of their high situation. But whereas they finde out Rama in the Tribe of Juda (as it seemes because of the place Mat. 2. 1. it appears that it bordered Bethlehem) and also out of Brochard and Breidenbach make Silo to have beene called Rama, and finde yet another Rama in Zabulon; these three have no warrant in the Scripture. Of Rama in the Tribe of Asser, as it seemes, we have testimonie, Ios. 19. 29. and of another in Nephtalim, Ios. 19. 36. of a third Rama, where Samuel dwelt in Mount Ephraim, 1. Sam. 25. 1. which more often is called Kamathas, and 1. Sam. 1. 1. Ramathaim Tzophim: for which the Septuagint haue Aramathaim-Tophim, taking the Article affixed in the beginning, for a part of the word, whence they thinke Ioseph of Arimathas, Mat. 27. 57. was denominated.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramoth in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Beniamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the uttermost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Basia in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did sicke from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramath I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because Ffd. 2. 26. hee neere to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Judas, as it appears Ffd. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plaine that he speaketh of that Rama with whose stones (after Basia had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Beniamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Juda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. we read that Iosiah through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South-border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Judges had almost vicerly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished Esa. 10. 27. of which word Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this citie also to Rama of Beniamin, appears Ind. 19. 13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodge Ind. 19. 13. By that place of 1. Sam. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some towne or Citie called Rama: where Iunius reades in excess, for in Rama: but it may be the name of the Kings palace in this citie, was Rama: as it seemes that in Rama of Saul 1. Sam. 22. 6. mucl, the name of the chief place where Samuel with the Colledge of Prophets abode: was neere, for which mucl Nath. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Ios. 7. 2. is placed neere Nath. It is not named by Iosua 1. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Ios. 8. 28. In solitudinem in tumulum perpetuum: Another Citie of chief note is reckoned Ios. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbion, the chief Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to bind the Israelites by oath to faue their liues, is set downe Ios. 9. whence they were reckoned among the Nethinai or Proselytes: and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of fauing these Gibeonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2. Sam. 2. 11. This Gibeon or Gibbion with Almon and Iebih (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremie the Prophet, were said Ios. 2. 18. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Nob, as appears 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Eliathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehem. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriath-earim: yet by the lamentable tragedie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is set downe 1. Sam. 2. 1. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehem. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esa. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gadim, and Atigrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Camp, 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabian his abode, 1. Macc. 9. 73. Of Giscala in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any heere in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I find no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, & come to the Citie of Hierusalem and the Princes and Gouernours of this Citie: A great part whereof was in the Tribe of Beniamin, whence Ios. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

§. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

What time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie * See in the out of which Melchisedec encountered Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) standeth by the river of Jordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Iosua his time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iosua slew) was then King of Hierusalem. That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeeres after him: euentill Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusai (the children of Iebus the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possesed it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the Citie of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walles, could not any where in the world be exampled: and besides that it had 150000. inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and a 50. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath seldom beene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Agypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Asa and the Idu- mean, and Ieroboam, Salomons seruant; and both married to Aegyptians: the State by the one distressed, by the other broken: Shishac first inuaded the Territorie of Juda, entered Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadazer, Tobu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ioss King of Israel; while Amasias the twelfth King thereof gouerned Juda.

Nor long after Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impouerished the Temple, and presented Eglathphalassar with the treasures thereof. And Manasse the sonne of Ezekiah, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaunts made by Ezekiah, to the Embassadors of Assyria, Israhel, left the remaine, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Iokim then reigning. But this vngratefull, idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the Walls and Towers which embraced them, euen and euell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crushed them with the heauie yoke of bondage and seruitude full seuentie yeeres, in somuch as Sion was not onely become as a stone and plowed vp field, Hierusalem an heape of bone, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soyle.

Then 70. yeeres being expired, according to the Prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie difficultie enough: and the Citie meanelly inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odde yeeres, till Nehemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagoses, or Vagoses, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes: after by Ptolomeus the first; then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craſſus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntary contribution of the people, and the liberality of strangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomeus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomeus Philadelphus. The mischief wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great Offerings which were sent to Iherusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the reigne of Herod that viciſſing and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had bene in the dayes of Salomon.

§. III.

Of the destruction of Iherusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the coming of our Saniour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeeres. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Jewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Jewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Pasſeuer: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of provision or store for any such multitudes. An extreme famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppress them within the wallles; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Idumaeans also, who lay in wait for the destruction of the Jewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to be short, thereperished of all sorts, from the first belieging to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand ioules: and the Citie was so beaten downe and demolished, as thofe which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleuee that there had bene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towres (works most magnificent, and ouer-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garriſons, as that thereby their victorie might be the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-outr became victorious.

After this, such Jewes as were scattered heere and there in Iudea, and other Prouinces, began againe to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeeres, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Alisius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towres, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone upon another, of that vngatefull Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulcher of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacitie, and called it after his owne name, AhaCapitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sowe to be cut in marble, and set in the front thereof, which hee did in despite of the Jewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thenceforth euer enter into the Citie, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palastina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeeres.

It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Aegyptian Saracens, who hold it 400. and odde yeeres.

In the yeere 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Bullon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when hee was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recovery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey foure score and eight yeeres: till in the yeere 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Agypt: and lastly, in the yeere 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Aegyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarree, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it Iherusalem alone that hath so oftentimes bene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World haue with their inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwracke. And it hath bene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impietie of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by flauerie; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possesse; of the walls and buildings, yea of the soyle and the beasts that feede thereon.

For, even that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitye, and fruitfulness; witnesseth the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the daies of the Kings of Iuda and Israel; it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barrenne. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no nor any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe; neither was it enough that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moucables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

§. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

IF the originall of the Jewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and injuriously. Quintilian speaks insamously of them, and of their leader; who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Aegyptians. Others affirme that while Isis gouerned Agypt, the people were so increased, as Ierolymus, and Indus led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions; which might be meant by Moses and Aaron for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth deriue the Jewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damasius, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among which hee diuided the land of Iuda; so called of Indus his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The yongest of the sonnes of Israel hee calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Agypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious, and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their foule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Agypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreme thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seventh day, for this cause euer after obserued the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discovering their vncleanness, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Aegyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the fifth booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Jewes, that they worshipped one only God: and thought it most prophane to represent the Deitie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any Cite by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus; who also makes Judas with Idumea, the first parents of the Iewes.

Cited by Stephanus in Iudea.

Cladius Iohann draws them from Judas, whose parents were Spartan and Iehus; whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedaemonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes: but they did it as defended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seeme to haue beene gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruered, according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the Storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which sayings, as touching the Iewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appian, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and so Chaldeans originallie, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanns, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Araxon; hauing mistaken the name of Abraham, who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Aram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel; another part after Esau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Iudeans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the tenne Tribes, the rest of the tenne Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Iudeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

Tert. in Apok.

Caleb. f. 63.

The gouernment which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Aegyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of Iephtha.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to vnder-take the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellst Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrant crueltie, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which he now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicicious imagination) made him confesse and acknowledge Gods iudgements against himselfe.

The tribes of Juda and Simeon did also master and possesse during this interregnum (or as somethinke, before the death of Iofua) the Cities of Azotus, Ascalon, Ebron and Hierusalem, which they burnt, and the Iebusites after reedified. They tooke also the Cities of Hebron, Debir, or Kiriathsepher, and Zephath, afterwards Horma. And although it be not set downe in expresse words that any one person commanded in chiefe ouer the people; as Moses and Iofua did: yet it seemeth that Caleb was of greatest authority among them: and that he with the aduice of phinees directed and ordered their warres. For if to any think that they proceeded without a Chiefe, the good successe which followed their vndertakings witnesseth the contrary. And it was Caleb euen while Iofua gouerned, as appeares, Iof. 10. 39. that propounded the attempt of Debir, to the rest of the Captaines: for the performance of which enterprize, hee promised his Daughter Achisah: which he performed to Othoniel his yonger brother after the conquest: whose behaviour in that seruice was such, as (next vnto the ordinance of God) it gaue him the greatest reputation among them, and may be esteemed the second cause of his preferment and election for their first Iudge soone after. But while those of Juda made warre with their borderers, from whom they onely recovered the mountainous Countries (for they could not driue out the inhabitants of the Valleyes, because they had Chariots of Iud. 1. 19. iron.) The rest of the Tribes fought also to enlarge and establish their owne Territories: in which warre they laboured with variable successe: for as the house of Ioseph recovered Bethel, or Luz, from the Hittites, so did the Amorites recover from Dan all the Iud. 1. 25. Iud. 1. 32. plaine Countries, and fott them to saue themselves in the Mountaines. And now the Israelites vnmindfull of Gods benefits, and how often hee had miraculously a-fore-time defended them, and made them victorious ouer their enemies (the Elders beeing also consumed, who better aduised them in the Inter-regnum) did not onely ioyne themselves in marriage with the Heathen Nations: but (that which was more detestable) they serued the Idols of Baal, and Aseroth, with other the dead gods of the Canaanites and Amorites. And therefore did the Lord God whom they had prouoked with their idolatry, deliuer them into the hands of the Aramites of Mesopotamia: whom Chusathaim at that time commanded. But after they had felt the snart of Gods displeasure against them eight yeeres, it pleased him to haue compassion on his people, and to raise vp Othoniel to be their Iudge and Leader: who by Gods assistance, deliuered his brethren from oppression: and enforced the Aramites to returne into their owne Disarts, and into Mesopotamia adioyning; after which the Israelites had peace fourtie yeeres, during all the time of Othoniels gouernment. This Othoniel is thought by Tostatus to haue beene the younger brother of Caleb, for as much as in the booke of Juda hee is twice called Othoniel the Sonne of Cenaz, Calebs younger brother. Others doe rather interpret those words (Calebs younger brother) as if they signified the meanest of his kinned. Indeed it is not likely, that Calebs Daughter should marrie with her own: Vncle; yet it followes not therefore that Othoniel should haue beene the meanest of the kinned. Wherefore wee may better thinke that hee was the Nephew of Caleb, (as some learned men expound it) and as the very words of Scripture seeme to enforce. For Caleb was the sonne of Iephunneth, and Othoniel the sonne of Cenaz, Calebs yonger brother; that is, he was not brother to Caleb, but his yonger brothers sonne; to whom it was not onely lawfull, but commendable to marrie with his Cousin German Calebs daughter.

How long it was from the death of Iofua to the gouernment of Othoniel, it cannot be found: but it seemes to haue beene no short time. For many Warres were made in that space against the people of the Land. Lush was then taken (as is thought) by the Danites; and the best Writers are of opinion, that betwene the times of Iofua and Othoniel that ciuill Warre brake out betwene the Beniamites and the rest of Israel, for the forcing to death of the Leuites Wife. For it is written, that in those dayes there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes. And as Juda ledde the people against the Canaanites during the Inter-regnum, so was hee commanded to doe against Beniamin, euen by the Lord God, whose direction they craued, as wanting a Iudge to appoint what should be done, which sheweth it to haue beene when Iofua was dead, & before the gouernment of Othoniel, especially considering, that all other times wherein they wanted Gouvernors, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue giuen them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre, if their power had beene as great, as it was in the managing of this action, wherein they lo weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this Age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this Age of Othaniel, Pandon or Pandareus, according to Homer, the first King of Athens: who began to rule in the twentieth yeere of Othaniel, and gouerned fortie yeeres. Hee was Father to Eritheus: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cadmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Paphus, and Tharjys, were built.

Ida and Dactylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcain long before wrought cunningly both in iron & brasse. Not long after this time, Amphion and Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine making a repetition of those fables, which were deuised among the Grecians and other Nations, during the gouernment of the Iudges, begins with Triptolemus, of whose parentage there is as little agreement. Vines vpon the thirteenth Chapter of S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei, and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Laclantius and Eusebius make him native of Athens: and the sonne of Eleusius King of Eleusina: which Eleusius by careful industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boat, which carried in her Prowe a grauen or carued Serpent: who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othaniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow: for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so confident with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeere when they began to rule) haue hit the mark of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne works, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne, but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not only in the reignes of Heathen Kings & Princes, but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authoritie of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth, and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the fewest Weekes, and in what not: Wherefore the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, & contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many wayes to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere, I auow it no otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a private opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priscis rebus veritas non ad regem querenda; In ancient things wee are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diodore.

§. III.

Of Ehuds time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that liued about those times.

After the death of Othaniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatrie, God encouraged Moab to inuade and suppress them: to performe which he ioynd the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readie findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feele the difference betwene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perils: within which they were so speedily folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eighteen yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his eares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weak man, though mained in his right hand, yet confident in the instresse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, hee resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguiish, hee assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to chioose a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, laden with presents from the Israelites, as to appease him, and obtaining priuate access vpon the pretence of some secret to be revealed, hee pierst his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge: and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, hee did repasse Jordan, and inuading the Territory of Moab, ouerthrew their Armie consisting of 10000. able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samar his Successor had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Axe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourecore yeeres from the death of Othaniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Elimelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, trauielled into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth isto be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourecore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orcus King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hypponium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere hee calleth Chemer, if hee meane not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrrhus, with whom Hercules and Thefeus ioynd themselves, they agreed together to recouer her: but Pluto or Orcus (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrrhus, and tare him in pieces, and had also worried Thefeus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Thefeus out of Hell. But Zeues, as I take it, hath writtne his storie somewhat more according to the truth. For Thefeus and Pyrrhus, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres his Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Thefeus and Pyrrhus were both taken: and because Pyrrhus was the principall in this conspiracie, and Thefeus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for foode to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Euripheus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossi which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Findus: of which Mountaines

Plut. lib. 11.

Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to bee in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossi in Thessaly: but these are neighbours to the Cassiopei, saith Plutarch in his Greeke questions.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Erichtheus, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the Northwinde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Tereus ravished Philomela, of which the fable was deuised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Tereus having married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not complaine; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in law's mercilesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it to Progne. In reuenge whercof Progne caused her onely sonne Ity: to bee cut in pieces, and set before Tereus her husband, so dreft as it appeared to be some other ordinary foode: of which when hee had eaten his fill, shee caused his head, hands, and feete, to bee presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets faigned, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to be Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Tereus, Pausanias hath built nere the Rockes Mergi, in the Territorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things to are supposed to haue bene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appeares that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Tereus was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryssa, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countie in Greece not farr from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulis, was in Pandion's time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Tereus was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom he might haue succour, rather than with any Tereus, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryssa, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue bene partly because, as Pausanias sayes, Daulis neq; uidificant, nec habitant in tota circum regione Hirundines: As if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there done to her, and her sister, did for euer after haue that place.

Nere this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Praxus King of the Argives, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Iuno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to bee constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the seven and fortieth year of Ehud, Tras began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpos, deuised the Heroicall Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia: and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was deuised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of loue: and some to the con-tentous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the name of Nymph Pleta: Dionysius and Didymus in Zeus, giue him another Mother. He was said to be the son of Iupiter: as some will haue it; because he had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he caused his owne Sonne to be slaine and dreft to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuised, that hee had alwaies Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Ouid:

Quarit

Quarit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captat
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth misse
The fleeting fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which Horie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Horace against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labyis sitiens fugientia captas
Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is faigned of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that he was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coetansis conuiuiis
Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue.
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reuerend mysteries are often peruerted by an vnclane and defiled minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in Matthe) to know the myserie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things be done in parables. So is it said of him that hee expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene in-ferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset essuri ea, quorum ipsi cognitionem ce- lum iuratum & vsti, ad illud progesio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius constaret; si Paul might haue uttered the things, the knowledge whercof the third heuens; and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture we might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Reucelin, thought it not the part of a wife man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, que ita recipere, vii Sus tubam, & fidem graculus, & vnguentum Scarabeus: quare silentium induxit discipulis, ne vulgo dinorum arcana patefacerent, que meditando facilius, quam loquendo apprehendantur; To set an Asse to a harpe, or to leame mysteries: which he would handle as a Swine doth a trumpet, or a Tray a viall, or Scarabie and vnclane flies sueraigne ointment. Wherefore he commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might be hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of so their couered meanings.

But to proceede with the contemporaries of And, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tirius liued whom Apollo slew, because he sought to force his Mother Ladona. Euphorion hath it thus, that Tirius was the Sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloved of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was deliuered of Tirius: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tribulus hath a louder lie of his stature out of Homere:

Hom. Od. 12.

Porrectuq; nouem Titius per iugera terra, Afiduus atro viscere pascit aues.

Nine furlongs stretch lies Titius, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing lucre daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocis, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was till eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Theſſalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but hauing slaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Helleſpont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Laomedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the wals of Troy, not by making the bricke leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

*Ilion aspicies, firmataq; turribus altis
Mœnia, Apollineæ structa canore lyra.*

Strong Ilion thou shalt see with wals and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wife Apollo's Harmonic.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megarians witnesse, saith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ehnd, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perſeus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduventure on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as he hunted, nere the Lake Triton, was surprisid and slaine: whose beauty when Perſeus beheld, he caused her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was such and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were turned into stones.

Euseb. in Chro.

Cecrops, the second of that name and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or as it is said, the 14. King of the Argives, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glauccus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who incited by Antea or Sthenobis, the wife of Prætus of the Argives, to accompanie her, but refusing it, the accusid him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Prætus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betweene him and his sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him against Chimæra, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the souldiers of Perſeus in Africa, to transport him, a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: vpon which beaſt Bellerophon ouer-came Chimæra: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious also ouer all those he arrived to Iobates in safetie: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew so insolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdainig, caused one of his stinging flies to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his backe, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blinde; of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiter's owne stable, Aurora begd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocency and vnderſerued aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreme hazard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour: but waxing out-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremities of sorrow, and euer during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimæra, was meant a cruell Pyrate of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the steare, of which three beaſts this Monster Chimæra was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the inuentor of sailes (the wings of a ship) are also attributed. Many other expofitions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not vnlikely, that Chimæra was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

L. 5. Æneid.

Ion also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Iouan) deriue their name of Iones, is said to haue bene about Ehnd's time: Homer calls them Ionnes, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Iouan. Perhaps it might be so that Ion himselfe tooke name from Iouan: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to reuiue the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The inuasion of India by Liber Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. Auguſtine makes him farre more ancient: placing him betweene the coming out of Ægypt, and the death of Iofua.

About the end of the 80. yeares, ascribed to Ehnd, and Samgar, Pelops, flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

§. III.

of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

After Israel had liued in peace and plenty to the end of these 80. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being worne out, which were witnesses of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehnd, and after him by Samgar, therest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commandements. For as Plentie and Peacere the parents of idle securitie, so is securitie as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their finnes were againe ripe for punishment, Iabin King of Hazor, after the death of Ehnd, inuaded the Territorie of Israel, and hauing in his seruice 900. yron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subiection twentie yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who incouraged Barac to leuie a force out of Nephtalim, and Zabulon, to encounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephtalim were more forward than the rest in this action; it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grievance, which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Hazor and Harofeth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nephtalim. So in the dayes of Iephtha the Gileadites tooke the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was, pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehnd to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisera by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest meanes. For the mighty Affirian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and reſtlesse, he ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causers of his brutish melancholy: and changed his matchlesse pride into the base humilitie of a Beast. And to approue that he is the Lord of all power, he sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when hee slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Egyptians in Noſes time: sometime by dead bodies, as when hee drowned Pharao by the waues of the Sea: and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iofua: sometimes by the ministrie of men, as when hee ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlaomer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. Hee caused the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Armie of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the fight of Yehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of 2. Chron. 18. examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah, the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takeſt, shall not be for thine honour, for thou shalt

the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a Woman. In which victorie all the strength of the Canaanite Isbin fell to the ground, euen to the last man: in the end of which Warre it seemeth that Isbin himselfe also perished, as appeareth by the last Verse of the fourth of Judges.

After all which Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his powerfullnesse, and great mercies, she sheweth the weake estate whereinto Israel was brought for their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other bordering Nations, in these words: Was there a shield or speare seene among forrie thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were feuered and amased, some of them confined ouer Iordan, and durst not ioyne themselves to the rest; as those of Reuben in Gilead: that the Amorites kept the Sea-coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land, and the children of Dan who neighboured the Sea, crept into their ships for safety, shewing thereby that all were disperfed, and all in effect lost. Shee then curseth the inhabitants of Moos, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the successe) came out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the ancient affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were enforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondence with Isbin the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their loue and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victorie in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens by him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thanks to God only victorious.

From the beginning of Isbins oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycena: The translation of this Kingdome Vines out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danau, Lynceus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lynceus divided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it selfe: Pratus his brother possit Ephra or Corinth, and Tirynthos, and other Cities with all the Territories towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tirynthos, which witness Pratus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was foretold by an Oracle, that hee should be slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon he caused her to be inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is said that Iupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: the meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other worthy man, corrupted her keepers with gold: and enioyed her, of whom Perseus was borne; who when hee grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Ctesias) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him vnwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoide the infamie of Patricide in Argos, changed Kingdomes with his Vncle Pratus: and built Mycena. This imprisonment of Danae, Sphocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurse and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this witty obseruation:

Inclusam Danaen, turris aenea,
Robustae, fores, & vigiliū canum
Tristes excubiae, muniēant satis
Nocturnū ab adulteris:

Si non Acrisium Virginis abditae
Custodem pauidum, Iupiter & Venus Rississent, fore enim tutum iter & patens, Conuerso in pretium Deo.

Aut per medios ire satellites, Rhorū impere amas saxa, potius ictu fulmineo.

The

The brazen Tower with dores close bar'd,
And watchfull bandogs frightfull guard,

Kept safe the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret loue:
Till smiling Venus, and wife Ioue Beguild her Fathers dread.
For chang'd into a golden shewre,
The god into her lap did powre
Himselfe, and tooke his pleasure.
Through gardes, and stonie wals to breake,
The thunder-bolt is farre more weake,
Then is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Inachus the first King, who began to reigne in the first year of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Sthenelus, Castor misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but at 417. Io was the Daughter of this Inachus: whom the Egyptians called Isis.

Phoroneus,
Apis,
Argus,
Piraeus, Phorbas,
Triopas, Crotopus, Sthenelus,
Danau, Lynceus,
Abas, Acrisius, Pelops.

After the translation to Mycena, Mar. Scotus findes these Kings:

Perseus, Sthenelus,
Eurythems,

Atrous and Thyestes } The sonnes of Pelops by Hippodamia: Atrous by Europa had Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Agamemnon, Aegisthus,
Orestes,
Tisamenus, Penibulus and Cometes.

Of these Kings Mercator and Bunting leaue out the two first, and the last: beginnaing with Eurythems: and ending with Penibulus. In Tisamenus time the Heraclida returned into Peloponnesus: of which hereafter.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Debora, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia: and Itho who built Ithum: with others mentioned in our Chronological table, as contemporaries with Debora.

§. V.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that liued in this Age.

Debora and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enioyed any quiet or prosperity: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did did so master them in a short time (the hand of God being with-held from their defence) as to saue themselves, they crept into caues of the mountaines, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plaines and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattle, destroying all that grew vp: covering the fields as thicke as grasshoppers: which seruitude lasted seauen years.

Jud. 6.

Jud. 6. 9. 5.

Jud. 6. 6. &amp; 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon the sonne of Joash, afterward called Terubbab: whose feare and vnwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearten him in his enterprize, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 32000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts: Each of these 300. by Gideon's appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terrour than force, with which hee gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so loud a noise, and seeing (at the cracke of so many pitchers broken) so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimites began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victorie being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprize) would no doubt haue held themselves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with traualle, and weary euen with the slaughtering of his enemies, he desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were four Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which weretaken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, fought the like reliefe from the inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would teare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thornes and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victorie: if I may presume to make coniecture, it seemes likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, & in the way of all inuasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their own peace with those Nations, & were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zebah and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the warre, that both enuie and maligant others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Country, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the smart of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their Prince and Country should suffer hazard and want, than that such men as they dislike, should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Basan, as it is thought.
Jud. 8. 10.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoeuer it were that he refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet he followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the uttermost: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surpris'd them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: and hauing put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall he tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had executed Gideon's brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request slew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this merueilous victory, he tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to that which hath beene said before. The debts of cruelty and mercy are neuer left vn-satisfied: for as he slew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall torments, so were his owne 70. sonnes all, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimelec. The like Analogie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who hauing caused the male children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, others of them to be cast into the riuer and drowned: God rewarded them euen with the like measure, destroying their own first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharao and his armie in the red sea. And hereof a world of examples might be giuen, both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraignie ouer them, and to establish him in the Government: which he refused, answering, I will not reigne ouer you, neither shall my childe reigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But he desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden care-tings, which euery man had gotten. For the Israelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vsed to wear them: the weight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. l. if we follow the account of the Shackle vulgar. And because he conuerthed that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silk, purple, scarlet, and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and serued the same in his owne Citie of Ophta or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vsed and so did David when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while he was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 120000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained; we may remember that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the armie came into the slaughter, and pursuit, for it is written; That hemen of Israel being gathered together out of Nephthalie, and out of Apher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution.

There liued with Gideon, Ageus, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athens: Euristheus King of Mycena: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Euristheus, the Kingdome of Mycena fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in ialousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not vnreueged. For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand-children, and all the lineage of Atreus died by the same sword.

In Gideon's time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Atalus, fled to Atmos, King of Crete, for succour: where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt. Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that she, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust, a thing no lesse vnnatural than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Domitian exhibited the like beastly spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater, of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appears by those verses of Martiall, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Iunctam Pasiphaen Diſcoo credite Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec se miratur Caesar, longæua vetustas Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Seruius makes a lesse vnholiest construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with child; and that she being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monster Minotaur, halfe Man and halfe a Bull. But this practise being discovered, and Dadalus appointed to be slaine, he fled out of Crete to Cocalus King of Sicily: in which passage he made flux expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boats which had oares onely, Dadalus framed failes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which he ouerwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was too ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dadalus, that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body and head of those men, whom they cared to counterfeit, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarke, who had seene some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus, found them exceeding rude.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the sonne of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slain by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Again, in this age those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom she mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus dissoluing her problems, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palaephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her help he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) he married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despitefull part, with her owne troops she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. He posselt himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Scylla, daughter of Nisus the King. He was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeere seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camicus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those Ilands.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odde cubites of length, which though Plutarke doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Seruius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because he cast so many men to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the Earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Mauritania. S. Angustine affirms that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a subtle Sophister.

§. VI.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

About the eleuenth yeere of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous discourses haue beene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Æson, who was Lepisther, reigning in Iolcus a town of Thessaly, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, intreated Isanto him, who coming hither, lost one shoe in passing ouer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what counsell he would take (supposing he were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heed: to which question when Isanto had briefly answered, that he would send him to Colchos, to fetch the golden fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, hauing a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallus: wherein he procured all the bravest men of Greece to saile with him: as Tiphis the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Castor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Telemachus and Peleus, sonnes of Æacus, and fathers of Atax and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiarus the great Soothsayer, Melager of Calidon that slew the great wilde boare: Ascalaphus and Talmenus of Almonus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy; Læertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idas and Lyncus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Castor and Pollux slew Castor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncus by Pollux; Idas by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the beech of Dadon, which could speake. They arriued first at Lemnos; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonauts. Hence they came to the Country about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that looking thence by night they were driuen by contrary windes backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to be the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blowes, insumch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funeral. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Myfia, where they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seeke Hylas the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Myfia, called Gios, wherein he reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myfia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebryces, the ancient inhabitants of the Countrey, ouer whom Amycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. He being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorlebars, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebryces in reuenge of his death slew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They sailed from hence to Salmydessus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Soothsayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to be a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduise, and direction for their voyage: you shall doe well quoth he first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caufed the table to be covered, and meat set on which was no sooner set downe, then that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged yong men saw this, they drew their swords, & pursued them through the ayre; some say that both the Harpyes and the yong men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did coucnant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to adventure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, & perceiuing that the pigeon had onely lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of the poope was bruised.

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades have stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonautes came to the Mariandyni, a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parthenius, whereto Jocus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Soothsayer of their company was slain by a wilde boare; also here Tiphis died: and Ancaeus undertooke to steere the ship. So they passed by the river Rhemodan, and mount Caucasus, and came to the river Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchis. When they were entred the haven, Iason went to Aetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his coming, desiring him to deliver the golden Fleece, which Aetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe; if hee alone would destroy together two brazen hoofe bules, and plowing the ground with them, sowe dragon teeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These bules were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Pulcan had giuen them to Aetes.

Whilist Iason was in a great perplexity about this taske, Medea the daughter of Aietes, fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priniile to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gave she to him a medicine wherewith the bad him to annoint both his body and his armour, which would preserve him from their violence: further she told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedy which inconvenience, she bad him throw stones amongst them as soone as they came vpon thicke, wherupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that hee might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile; whereto when the euent had answered, he againe demanded the Fleece. But Aetes was so farre from approuing such his desire, that he deuised how to destroy the Argonautes, and burge their ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oak in the groue of Mars, where they say it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, she went with Iason into the ship Argo; hauing with her, her brother Abysrus.

Aetes vnderstanding the practises of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when Medea perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, she scattered his limbs in diuers places, of which Aetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greeke word signifieth Disiusion. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonautes were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the River Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abysrides, there the ship Argo that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable, spake to them, and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Aisonia, and were clesed by Circé, from the murder of Abysrus. Now they thereupon sayling betwene the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the sea of Sardinia and along the coast of Herzulia, came to the Ile of Aea, wherein Circé dwelt, who clesed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he stayed them. One ly Butes swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Lysibeam in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the straging rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoke. But Theseis and the Ne-rides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Luno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beemes of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra, the land of the Phaeaces, where King Alcinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchis, that had bene sent by Aetes in quest of the ship of Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, beooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Coreyra, others in the Ilands Abysrides, and some coming to the Phaeaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Alcinous: whereto Alcinous made answer, that if she were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if she were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arcté, the wife of Alcinous, hearing this, married them: wherfore they of Colchis not daring to returne home, sayled with the Phaeaces; so the Argonautes departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this land, Minos reigned, who had a man of brasie giuen to him (as some of the Fables say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from thenecke to the heele, the end wherof was closed vp with a brazen nail, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice a day about the land for the defence of it. When he saw the ship Argo passe by, he threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall, she drew out the nail: that stoppt his veine, by which means all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slain by Peleus, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonautes sailed to Argina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Argina they sailed by Euboea and Laconia home to Iolcos, wherethey arrived, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Iason vnderstand the myserie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists draw the welle labours of Hercules. Suidas thinks that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metals might be transmuted. Others would signifye by Iason, wisdom, and moderation, which our commeth all perils: but that which is most probable is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeede to rob Colchis, to which they might arrive by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash down many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting vnto let many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth through, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and Currents in the passage betwene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerted into those fiery bules, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasie, the Syrus, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and adventures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder poetcall morales: all which Homer afterward vied the man of brasie excepted in the description of Phyliss his traualles, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Iair, and of the Lapythe, and of Theseus, Hypolytus, &c.

AFTER the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Sechemites, remembering what offes had bene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his their perpetuall Princes, and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignie, practised with the inhabitants of Sechem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe; who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne, readily consented: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their idoll Baalberith, which which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabounds, to assist his first deceitfull enterprize, to wit, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wives, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Iotham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath bene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-pow'rfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euermore) neither hath it respect to nature, which labourerth the preservation of euery being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions passions and affections, by which the foules of men are tormented, are by their contraries oftentimes resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth every vice, and is it selfe the child and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane so euer) which may serue it: remembering nothing, whatsoeuer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alliaunce on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnder takers, and rather praiseth the aduenterer than feareth the like successe. It was the first finne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient then man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Diuell which felt the sinne thereof, taught him to forge the ones out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting euery age, and mans condition.

Iotham, the youngest of Gideons sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best persuasions to alienate the Sachemites, from the assisting of this merciless tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receive as vnsauyfull, what others had no power to giue; without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with its samesse, the Figge tree with sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraigntie. He also foretold them by a Prophetiall spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an euill matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gaal the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech: who therefore after some assaults entered the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Castle or Tower of Tober, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne over the wall by a woman, and smiting himselfe mortally bruis'd, he commanded his owne page to pierce his body, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech usurped the Gouernment, the Lapithe and *Centaur*es made war against the Thebans. These Nations were defended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuised to mannege horses, to bridle and to sit them: in so much as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plains, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Americans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first invaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Thola of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeeres, and after him Lur the Gaditic 22. yeeres, who seemes to be defended of Lur the sonne of Masse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Manah Lur. For to this Lur there remained thirte of those Cities, which his ancestor had recovered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Lur iudged Israel, Priamus began to reigne in Troy, who at such time as *Hecub*es sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ranome, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy, and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as he became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cissus King of Thrace, and had in all (saith Cicero) fittie sonnes, wherof seauenteene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempting to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helen the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the warre which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to reigne in the beginning of Lur: some writers call him the sonne of Nephtune and Athra: but Plutark in the storie of his life finds him begotten by Ageus, of whom the Gracian sea betwene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as he forst them to pay him him seven of their sonnes euery yeere for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which he begot on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seven Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free his Countrie of that sturrie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing possesst himselfe of Ariadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he receiued from her a bosome of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Citie of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane wherof hauing slaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Ageus had giuen order, that if he came backe with victorie and in safety, he should vie a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournfull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Ageus deserying the Shippe of Theseus with a blacke saile, did call himselfe ouer the rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name Aegean.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Scyron, who kept a passage betwene Megara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward he did the like to Cercyon, by wrestlings, who vied by that Art to kill others. Hee also ridde the Countrey of Procrustes, who vied to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one and part to the other bough, and by the springing vp tare them asunder. So did hee rout out Periphetes and other mischieuous theues and murderers. Hee ouerthrew the arinie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entered the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hippolita prisoner, began on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phedra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abule his fathers bed, Phedra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is faired, that Theseus besought Nephtune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Nephtune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vnderstanded destinie, when Phedra had heard of, she strangled her selfe. After which it is faired, that Diana entreated Aesculapius to set Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italy, to accompanie her in her hunting; and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receiue many wounds in forcing his passage and escape; which wounds Aesculapius, to wit, some skillfull Physician, or Chirurgeon healed againe, after which he passed into Italy, where he liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stoiques, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vaste places wherof they know nothing, fill the same with strange beasts, birdes, and fishes, and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Gracian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe the tales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thinne and ragged villages: in recompence wherof, and for deuising them lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say per Ostracismum, by the Law of Lottes, or names written on shelles, which was a deuice of his owne.

Hee stole Helen (as they say) when she was fittie yeeres old, from Aphidna, which City Caltor and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Erasthrastus and Pausanias write that Theseus begot her with child at Argos, where the Temple to Lucina: but hee rage makes that tale vnlikely to be true, and so doth the tale of Theseus who gouerned Israel 22. yeeres, to whom succeeded Iephth or Iepht fixe yeeres, to whom Isaiah who ruled seven yeeres, and then Isaiah eight yeeres: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So as, if Theseus had a child by her in the first of Lur, (at which which time wee must count her no lesse than fifteene yeeres old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now) she was then at least two and fiftie yeeres old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe in effect consent, that the Citie was entred, and burnt in the first yere of Demophon King of Athens, the successor of Mnesheus, the successor of Theseus, seuteneene dayes before the Summer Tropique; and that about the eleuenth of September following, the Troians crost the Hellespont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they navigated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeere, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, that when Polyphides governed Sicily, Athenius Athens, Tantanes Assyria, Habdon Israel, then Aneas arrived in Italie, transporting with him in twentie shippes the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicily Phaustus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeeres, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successors, Adraustus, who reigned foure yeeres, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Tair, so is also Mneithens King of Athens, and Atrous, who held a great part of Poloponnesus. In Assyria, during the government of these two peaceable Iudges, Mureus and after him Tantanes reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramfes, and afterwards Annemenes.

S. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that ever Greece Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held true) against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vrgeth them with this obiection.

*Si nulla fuit genitalis origo
Rerum, & mundi, semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troie,
Non alias alij quoque res cecinerunt poeta?*

If all this world had no original,
But things have euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poet sing some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the captaines of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than hee could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourese they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees or sow more corne than was necessary for their sustentance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homer did write, who measureth the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armor of Glauco was worth an hundred Beeces, and the copper armour of Dionides worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsual exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Asycena the principall Citie in Poloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Poloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds; as likewise did the Athenians because their Country was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easily appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the preface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these latter times times, idle Chroniclers vlc when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which women cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember only the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or cluthearle fables of men changed into birds, of strange monstres, of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that fauoured of humane before the time of the warre of Thebes: the briefe whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing bene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Jocasta, called by Homer Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to be his mother, hee begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proceesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the greivous murder and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang her selfe. Some say that Oedipus hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes because they suffered their father to bee cast out of the Towne; and ayded him not. Howsoeuer it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement, that the one of them should reigne one yeere, and the other another yeere; and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeeres government reigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeere, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, he was driuen to seek lodging in an out-house, on the backside.

There he met with Tydeus the sonne of Oeneus, who was fledde from Calidon: with whom struing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyse, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiving in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an olde Oracle, by which hee was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deiroke vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, hee was desirous among others to carrie Amphiarus the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is saide to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both vterly refuse to be one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiarus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her husband to assent him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbad his wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a iewel, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betwene Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, cyther of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did loue a bracelet better than her husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than auoid destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the

Thebans. Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seven chiefe leaders were; himselfe, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (instead of whom some name Mes-siens) all Argines, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Atolian, and Parthenopus the Arcadian (sonne of Melaeger and Adalman). When the Armie came to the Nemean Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; this hauing a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argines to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Aspille the daughter of Theas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saved when the women of the Ile flew all the the males by confpiracie, intending to leade an Amazonian life. For such her pietie, the Lemnian wiues did sell her to Pyrrares, and the Pyrrates to Lycurgus Lord of the Countrey about Nemea, whose young sonne Ophelus or Archemorus, she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When vpon the childes death shee hid her selfe for feare of her master, Amphiarus told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the child, and in memorie of the chance, did institute solemne funerals games called Nemean, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with whorle bats, Amphiarus at running and quoyting, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in darting. This was the first institution of the Nemean games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Ophellus, a Lacedemonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slaine the Nemean Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is heere set downe.

From Nemea the Argiues marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Couenants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was thoroughly resolu'd to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them, not without much enuy and malice of the people, who laid fiftie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the armie, of which fiftie he slew all but one, whom he sent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argiues vnderstood how resolu'd Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seuen gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very firre stronger, could force muster vp more thousands then Thebes had gates) did compass the towne. Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Crenis, Amphiarus at Proctis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Eletha, and Polynices at Hypsisia. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, took a aduile of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, if Athenas the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and so enuious at his Creatours glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worship, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when he hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Gallies, Germanes, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in designing the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus with our aduile of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Countrey rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africk, and crucified the Priests in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing: yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue bene practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satan's malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Mencius, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as he thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vp vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as Writers haue it) was stricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battell, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Astacus behaued themselves very valiantly: Ismarus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of

of the seuen Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seuen (who was said to haue been so faire that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Neptune: and the valiant Tydeus by Mentalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Mentalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiarus, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallus, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wounds, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiarus fled: of whom Amphiarus is said to haue bene swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the river Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight: being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carcases, or drowned in the river: and his body neuer found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens, where sitting at an Altar called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to be buried: but caused Anigone, the onely daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to bee buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creon's Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Armie vnder the Conduct of Theseus, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Enadine the wife of Capaneus, threw herselfe into the funerals fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Captaines which were slaine at Thebes, that any less reuenge should bee taken of their fathers death, then the ruine of the Citie: wherefore some yeere after hauing leui'd forces, Aegialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydem, Promachus of Parthenopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Meceheus, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alemaan the sonne of Amphiarus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victory if Alemaan wereth their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incourted by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Aegialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driuen to flight, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alemaan. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselves with their wiues & children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, til at length they built the Towne called Ecthea. The Argiues, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Towne, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste; shewbeit it is reported by some, that the Towne was saued by Thirsander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to returne, did there reigne ouer them. That he saued the Citie from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephtha, and how the three hundred yeeres which he speaketh of, Ind. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1. Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Iair (neere about whose times these things hapned in Greece, & during whose government, & that of Thola, Israel liued in peace & in order) they reuolted again from the law & seruice of God, and became more wicked & idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adoyning, and embraced the idolls of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, and afterward by the Philistims, so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims. Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppressed, because they bordered

vpon the Ammonites, they were inforced to seeke Iephthā, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of diuinish hatred and reuenge, was content to leade the Gileadites to the Warre, vpon condition that they should establish him their Gouernour after victory. And when hee had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammons rights, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same preuailing nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, ouerthrew them: and did not onely beate them out of the plaines, but forst them over the mountaines of Arabis, euen to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest heretofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vaine vow which he made, to sacrifice the first liuing creature hee encountered, comming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and onely desired two months time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Borrbhaus and others proue sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephthā's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slaughter that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephthā, that they were not called to the Warre, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Iephthā hereupon enforced to defend himselfe against their fury, in the encounter slew of them two and forty thousand, which so weakened the bodie of the Land, as the Philistines had an easie conquest of them all not long after: Iephthā, after he had iudged Israel fixe yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seuen yeeres: after him Elon was their Iudge tenne yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius findes not Elon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessary vpon the occasion of Iephthā's account of the times Iud. 11. 28. (where he sayes that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Iephthā and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Iephthā heere challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iosua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Aegypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were continued 480. yeeres. To the first Beroaldus findeth Iephthā's 300. yeeres to be but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iosua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Deborā, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephthā (saith Beroaldus) putteth or propoeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic ut dicat ammon rex propterea trecentisimum, ex quo nullus licet ea de re mouerit Israel: so hee speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or vnder the three hundred yeere, since Israel posselt those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codeman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephthā named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captivity, at severall times, of which (as Codeman thinketh) Iephthā forbore to reapeate the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonites should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeeres, it was enough for prescription, he committeth the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeeres more, and so maketh vpon the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: twenty yeeres hee giueth to the Seniors betweene Iosua and Othniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighty yeeres to Iosua his gouernment, Codeman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. Melancthon 31. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtful than the other of 71. But though wee admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee add them to the 266. yeeres of of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of these, wee haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephthā should leaue out more then halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, and say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the Countries in question. Martin Luther is the Author of this opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembered by Iephthā, to be 306. which odd yeeres, saith hee, Iephthā omitteeth. But because the yeeres of euery Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp this number of 306: but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number, the whole time which Moses spent in the Deserts of Arabia Petraea, which fortie yeeres of Moses added to the number which Beroaldus findeth, of 266. make indeede 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute betweene Iephthā and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon in these words: Because Israelooke my Land, when they came up from Aegypt, from Arnon onto Iabor, &c. now therefore restore those Lands quietly or in peace. So by this place it is plaine that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Aegypt: but from the time that the Land was posselt. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel ierusalem: Because Israelooke my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephthā answereth also confirmeth in these words: When Israel dwelt in Heshbon, and in her Townes, and in Aracr & in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300. yeeres: why did ye not then recover them in that space? So this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to posselt it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; so, we doe not vnclearly reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, and sayes, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and isto take beginning from the first of Asphas narration: when hee makes a briefe repetition of Moses whole journey: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Iudges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Aegypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeeres (as hee thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not onely the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text and Iephthā's owne words: of which I haue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leave to iudge, whether we may not beginne the 480. yeeres, from the deducence out of Aegypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Aegypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephthā's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue bene signified. For first, touching Iephthā's three hundred yeeres of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites posselt it, Sehon and Moab had disposselt Moab and Ammon thereof. So that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel: and so Iephthā might say that they had posselt those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed in this of S. Paul, Acts 13. that from the end of Iosua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I finde his opinion cited by Fancius Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approue the times from the egression out of Aegypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first King, 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Now so far as much as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iosua, to the last of Heli, and leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerely referred to the death or after the death of Iofua, as shall bee hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman: where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, hee takes his account from the death of Iofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit: of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder thungers, 111. Thereason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because hee thinks that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres, and whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, hee findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue bene spent after the death of Iofua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Cashan, or the election of Othniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approue this time of the Elders, hee citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iofua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel serued the Lord all the daies of Iofua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-lined Iofua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueeth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if heere also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, betweene Iofua and Othniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Othniels 40. to beginne presently vpon the death of Iofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to bee the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to enforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres, besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors, betweene Iofua and Othniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Judges, which are 339. wee haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to bee much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to beginne immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it bee receiued forme that there was vitium scriptoris in the text. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fertie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: And hee destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Judges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse hee speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wilderness, then in the nineteenth verse hee commeth vnto the acts of Iofua, which were, that hee destroyed seven Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth: Then afterward hee gaue them Judges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The only inconuenience of any waight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is that it seemes irreconcilable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeede there were spent 450. yeeres betweene the end of Iofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie

Cod.

Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 11. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journeying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Othniels gouernment; from whence if wee call the yeeres of the Judges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make 397. yeeres) and so to these yeeres shall the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith hee) that the annus egressionis, 1. Reg. 6. 11. should be vnderstood egressionis non incipientis sed finitæ, the yeere of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Egypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to haue beene done in their going out of Egypt, as Psalm 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driuen backe, and Deut. 4. 45. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus farre it seemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finito: for it Iunius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that heerein he doth well, why may not we also, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

The next point to be cleered, is how their journeying should be said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Othniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length feared themselves, as it is declared Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephtha, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that wee should suppose that Othniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either he might haue bene dead, or at least, as Gideon did, hee might haue refused all loueignty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Othniels victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps bee receiued as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set down. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Lush, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Othniel? Or what other probability hath hee than his owne coniecture, to shew that Othniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after five and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearfall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeede be properly said to haue bene, when Israel came out of Egypt; likewise say that King Edward the first was crowned when hee came out of the holie Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place eyther whence or whither they tend. But I thinke that hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or faith by conuertyng the proposition, when Jordan was turning backe, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arrivall out of Palastina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may wee then beleue that enterprize performed for many yeeres after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue bene at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not thinke it most strange, that the most notable account of time, seruing as the onely guide for certayne ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning from from that illustrious deliuerance out of Agypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) and the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Towne by like hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time giuen to it, or a time farre different from that which he supposed, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation so to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle Saint Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp our Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein I see streweth Christ to haue bene the true Messias) the Apostle was so farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne and beleued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wilderness, whereof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the wilderness about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he send to tell them, that an hundred and eleven yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Judges: for this had bene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is nota worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so exactly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memorie and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evidently his ascribing in the same place 40. yeeres to the reignes of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided betwene Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the government of the Prophet, how fower they are heere included in the reignes of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the generall opinion, when it fauoreth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to helpe wherethe need is not ouer-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Berosus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quingentis annis; A. it were foure hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed, and therefore diuoyne the members to make the account euen. In so doing he hatheth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Agypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already giuen faill to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange methode, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himselfe in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vige him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Othniel could not gouerne about 25. yeeres, because then was the taking of Laisb, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Dantes

Danier must needs haue taken Laisb at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the coming of Israel out of Agypt, without excluding the yeeres of seruitude; And that the yeeres of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise hee himselfe should haue spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of the iudicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our storie. To the time of Tephia are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prouisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Ibean: from which time, if the Warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greekes had sixe yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this VVar, longa preparatio belli celerem afferit victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victory: for the Greekes consumed tenne yeeres in the attempt: and Troy, as it seemes, was entered, sacked and burnt in the third yeere of Habdon.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the sixt yeere of Habdon, Aneas arrived in Italie. Habdon in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had bene the Father of 40. sonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Iud. 13. v. 1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Tair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Tephia, for not calling them to War ouer Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their owne Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppressed: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being overthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum betwene the death of Habdon, and the deliuerance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. 1.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue observed Historiall truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon, Iudge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather choolse here to intreat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to breake the story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuersitie of occurrences.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tenueer and Dardanius were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reinecius thinks) tooke from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests vpon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

*Creta Iouis magni medio iacet insula ponto:
Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostra.*

*Centum Vrbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (sivis audita recorder)
Teucus Rhæteus primum est aduētus ad aras:
Optauitque locum regno. Nondum lūum & arces Pergameæ steterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiq; ara, Idæumq; nemus.*

In the maine Sea the Ile of Creete doth lie:
Where Joue was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundredth great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhætean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Iliou was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybelis rites were bought:
Hence Corybanti Cymbales did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authoritie, that Teucer first gaue name to that Countrie, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Graij cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atq; ubera gleba,
OEnotrij coluere viros, nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ductis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propria sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Iasiusq; Pater, genus à quo Principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Gracians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
OEnotrians held it, now the later progenie
Giues it their Capitaines name, and calls it Italie;
This seate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stocke, Iasius.

Alfo, Aeneid.

*Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Auruncos ita ferre senes, hic ortus cui agris
Dardanus Idæus Phrygia penetrauit ad vrbes, Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum, Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cæli Accipit, &c.*

Some old Auruncans, I remember well, (Though time haue made the same obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie,
And leaving Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did faile to Samothrace;
But now inthroned he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrarie to this, and to so many Authors, approuing and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, and Thracæ, are deriued from Troas or Thras the son of Iaphet: and that the Dardaniens, Myrians, & Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were were Germane Nations, descended from Asfkenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and Riuer of Ascanius in Asia tooke name: That Asfkenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not vnlikely: neither is it vnlikely, that the Ascanij, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Troas, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Italicus makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authority is the more to be regarded; because he had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrie, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Niece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his Daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds other wife, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Iupiter, which Electra was the Daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom the bare Iasius. Annius out of his herosus finds the name of Camboblastes, to whom he giues the addition of Coritus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betwene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscuritie of the historie giues leaue to Annius of saying what he list. I that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Iupiter, it must haue bene of some elder Iupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which alio is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often bene said) there were many Iupiters, and many of almost euery name of the Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my selfe with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set downe the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Atlas

Many by valour haue deseru'd renowne
 Ere Agamemnon : yet lye all oppressed
 Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne :
 For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilseth these writers haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble vnderakers : they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that wee seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories ; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit and delight : yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise ; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great warre. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking armes : but how he was hereunto emboldened it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen : and strength of both sides for the warre.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre ; saying, That whereas the Phanicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phoenicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was emboldened to doe the like ; not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phanicians ? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phanicians ? Thucydides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plaine, that the name of Barbarians was not vsed at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy ; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to thinke, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie received by one : or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world ; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue bene true. For Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruell man, seeing his owne sonne Tenear durst not come in his sight after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Aias (which Tenear could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom she had borne children which were to succede in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione : but was meereley incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greekes from Barbarians, but Greekes, as Herodotus discouerseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them ; and hauing stolen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus, and Pirithous attempt Proserpine ; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of piracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull then merchandise : wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if shee were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping ; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands : he was also rich in money, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more then any other of the Greece Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by the reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus ; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprize ; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts : but the vessels were not great : for it was not then the manner to build ships with deckes, onely they vsed (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meete for robbing on the Sea, the least of which carried fittie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece : and the greatness of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole yeeres did stand out against such forces : yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads ; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Misia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke, out of Aethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenas being detained in Egypt ; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treatie, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadors to Troy ; who demanded Helen and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made hereunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helen, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuatory. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them : dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeede she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odyssey, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before hee returned home to Sparda ; which voyage it were not easily beleued, that he made for pleasure : and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may we thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Hauen in the Greekish seas : whereas Menelaus might haue put into any port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Navigation.

repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loft, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of thofe warres, hauing flaine a man, to ftrip him and hale away his body, not reftoring it without ranfome, if he were one of mark. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, flightly armed, and commonly followed the fucceffe of their Capitaines; who rode not vpon horfes, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three of their Capitaines; who were guided by fome truſtie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Capitaines, who by the fwiftneſſe of their horſes preſenting themſelves where neede required, threw firſt their launces, and then alighting fought on foot, with ſwords and battel-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or elfe returning to their Chariots when they found caufe, and ſo began againe with a new dart as they could get, if their old were loft, or broken. Their armes defence were helmets, breſt-plates, bootes of braſſe or other metall, and ſhields commonly of leather plated ouer. The offence were ſwords and battel-axes at hand, and ſtones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any diſtance. Theſe of their Chariots (befides the fwiftneſſe) was to keepe them from wearineſſe, whereto the leaders were much ſubiect, becauſe of their armour, which the ſtrongeſt and ſtoutſt were heauieſt: alſo that from them they might throw their launces downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I finde not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often diſtuent to returne to their Tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewiſe of armours they had little change or none; eury man (ſpeaking of the chiefs) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were loft or broken, he was diſtuent to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from ſome Capitaine whom he had flaine, and ſtripped; or elfe to borrow of them that had by ſuch meanes gotten ſome to ſpare. Whereas therefore Achilles had loft his armour which Hector (as is ſaid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very deſirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

of Patroclus his deare friend.
At this time Agamemnon reconciled himself vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his<sup>30</sup> concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so becaue himselfe, that he did not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also leue the valiant  Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleueed) he chased three times about the wals of Troy. But great question may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians, were fled into it:
nor that he could leape ouer theiuers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must haue done in that flight: nor that the Troians perceiving Hector in such an extremite, would haue for-borne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace A- chilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely car-<sup>40</sup> ry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leathern threds into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his cruelty and couctoulnesse were not long vnreruenged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Parris, as Homer sayes, in the Seagange, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farr in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron saith) at the selfe-faine rate that Hector was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofe-gyn of her valour, was slaine by Pyrhus the sonne of Achilles.

ξ. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Finally, after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treason of Antenor and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Scam, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entering by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the wals vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had bene a desperate adventure, and steruing to no purpose. For either the Trians might haue perceived the deceit, and flaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which altho by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon): or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was vnlively, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals vpon the sudden to doe it): by which meanes they who were shut into, must haue perished, for hunger, if they had not by suffering forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is hereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needelesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armeie, so that the suffering of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

piling of any gate by them was now to no purpose. John Baptista Gramay in his History of Afrique, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Citizens did both batter the wals with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Seane gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Gracians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dicys must proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the common report; had it not bene that either those bookes were euener in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnance to the other authors as now is found in them.

Alfo concerning the number of men flaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis fuy to haue bene aboute 600000. on the Troian fide , and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report meereley fabulous; for as much as the whole flecte of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as he could, to be fume what leffe than 1200. faile, and the armie therein tranfported ouer the Greece fhis, not much about 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common falftion of mento extoll the deedes of their Auncients : for which caufe both Homer mentioned the Captaines of the Greekes that ferued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their Citie, from which the Romans defended. Yea the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Perſian King made againſt all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Alexander the ſonne of Petereus had ſhewed, in marſhalling the Grecians before Troy : whereupon, as if it had bene a matter of much conſequence, they were to proud, that they refuſed to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almoſt all Sicily, the Admirall of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promiſed to bring 200. good fighting ſhips, and 20000. men for their defence.

and 30000. men for their defence.

The like yancie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihooods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But these Nations, which indeed, or in most probability came of the Troians, were the Albans in Italy, and from them the Romans brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Genetians first sent in Padua, and the Countrey adjoining by Ancora: the Chadians planted in Epirus by Helenus the sonne of King Priamus, to which Hellanicus added, that the posteritie of Peleus and resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

6. VI.

§. V I.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

O Concerning the Greekes, they tasted as much misery as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countreys by faction: some were slaine anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the Sovereignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to have bene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising from the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perwaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus, and Philottetes, who neuertheless, as Virgill tels, were driven soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philottetes at Perilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdom. Menelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten yeeres, having lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoore recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to seek out new habitations.

Aux the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Danius, who was Lord of the Tapyres in Apulia, some of the Locrians were driven into Aspricke, others into Italie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driven to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had bene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it: The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there: the overthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Interregnum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

2970.

HE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not neede to make yo a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that storie. First, that the Angell of God forbid the wife of Manash the mother of Samson, to drinke wine or strong drinke, or to cate any vncleane meate, after shee was conceiued with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himselfe, and deliue-

red by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, or at least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinke, nor meate, how strong or vncleane soeuer, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinke farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the sacrifice which Manash would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that profess diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas enervit; Whom no force could overcome, Voluptuissime overthrew.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in harvest time, and giuen them a great overthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vying these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers over thee, &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gaue them an other overthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his owne life, to be auenged of his enemies, when he pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca, Patientia sepe lesa virtutis in furem, Patience often wounded is converted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken, and of Dagon's fall, and the sending back of the Arke.

THE storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sinnes were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and profaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the sword of the Philistims; 40 of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 3000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocci the fifth, Ozi the sonne of Bocci the sixth, and then Elias, Iosephus and Lyranus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimias and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsooke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the answer of God, thus he spake: Come and let us go to the Seer: for he that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; nor that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Maspa or Mitspa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Mitspa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia.) It pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophesie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall he thunder vpon them. &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God; which Josephus called, Lapidem sortium: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunistic advantage of the victory, the Israelites recouered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims; who for a long time after did not offer any insinuation or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Iamites to the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath bene elsewhere said.

CHAP. XVI.

OF SAVL.

§. I.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

VT when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that he was not able to vnder-geoe the burthen of so carefull a government, he put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beerseba, a Citie the very vtmost towards the South of Iudaa. And as the place was inconvenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse remoued from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couetousnesse, the more it swallowed, the more it dieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they set the Law at a price, and sold iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which so when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be iudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yelde fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choice of a King.

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from God: which surely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approued his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, heeued his best arguments to dehont them: which when he perceived to be ouer-feeble, he deliuered vnto them from Gods reuelation, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath bene borne, and is so still by free consents of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first hee makes them know, that the King will vict their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto breed and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, Hee will take your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees; and give them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God foretelleth this change of government from Iudges to Kings; and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: hee commaundeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is tuis and right shall thou follow, that thou mayest liue. Now if it be not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard itselfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take away any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes; and againe, This shall be the manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby forcing what power feared from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hercof we finde the first example in Achab, who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should bee indged with iustice and iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money which he refused: yet because hee was falsely accused, and vniuilly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, even as David testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in testimonium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata equitas non est equitas: sed dupliciter peccatum in quo est iniquitas et simulatio. Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one, nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputatiō, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of fre Monarchie; which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Onely this much I will say, that if practice doe shew the grasse of authority, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes; but that they did what seeler they pleased in the the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Saulon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not onely fore-told by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equall the Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath bene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not need to ouer-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges euery man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had; what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Jordan; the Philistines the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time; all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the finnes of Samuel, they became deafe to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel vsed, insinuating vpon this point, that they would haue a King, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent query man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

For that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbore the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom he commanded Samuel to appoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandered diuers daies to seeke his fathers asses, at length by the aduice of his seruant trauelled towards Ramath, to finde a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Ass, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it pleased him to call Abner, while he fed the sheepe of Zeithro; and after to make choise of David the yongest of eight finnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheepe-hooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Israel. So Iohn and Jacob were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignitie that did not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerslasting in Gods chattering Kingdome.

When Samuel was entered into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom yet hee expected, and stayed his arrival at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had fore-told him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, about all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should encounter him by Kabets Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Zabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men inuited with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, & after them Gad, Nathan, Ahijah, Elisha, Elsai, Ishaj, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praeterita, praesentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of 1. Cor. 14. 14. who enriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpah Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpah, the general opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of \ Prim & Thummi*: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mysterie vpon his breast when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue recorded diuers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to bee vnder-taken: the two first kindes were called diuiniorie; the third, diuinatory; and vnto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes howsoeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the Kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confers it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller then all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition, tooke no notice.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee received knowledge that Nabab King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Gilead: which Nation had often since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephia, neuer durst attempt anie thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephia's time, yet they neuer perfwaded themselves of more aduantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had used great care and policie that they should haue no Smithes to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemites and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more then 50000. and therefore in these respects, euencasion it selfe inuited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the necrest. Besides, it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were emboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not onely slaughter the men and male-children, but took from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likelie to haue bene increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time bene disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be verely disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath bene spoken: Saul, both to value himselfe in his first yeeres reigne, and because perchance hee was descended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel, heaving a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, should his Oxen be serued: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven daies to giue Nahai the Ammonite an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue leuered themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezeck, neere Jordan, that he might readily passe the Riuer; which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

The Prim & Thummi in the ornaments of the High-priest were inserted within the peccatorially, which therefore was duplicatid, they were placed in the peccatorially against the heart of the High-priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones nor any thing made by the Artificers. See Exod. c. 38. Cir. de diuin.

The Armie by Saul, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hee returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Nahai the Ammonite. And to the end that hee might set on them on all sides, hee diuided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heat of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troupe enforced them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe the people were so farre in loue with their new King, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

After the Armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and rehearsal of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natiuitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall reiection.

In Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, by Saul, Saul past by, when he came from Rama, where hee was first anointed, which which they thinke to haue bene: Cariath-earim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariath-earim: but Iunius vnderstands this Garrison to haue bene at Gebah in Beniamin neere Gibeah, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoeuer, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and fixe thousand Horse, wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samarra to Hiersusalem, and in the midst of the Land betweene the Seand Jordan. With this sudden inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountains; other fledde ouer Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of Iosua when he led Israel ouer Jordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel seven daies: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceiued his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandments: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to haue bene any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him hee could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoeuer was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, hee was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes visitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant bene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe: at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posterie.

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armor as they had, behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now bene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoeuer, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stiffe as serued for the Plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kind of armes is manifest, or else they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found among those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forsooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troupe he held himselfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength; and better assured vnto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoeuer in the time of Samuel much had bene done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no maruell if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel be repainted againe. For this yranie of the Philistims isto bee vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Judea: Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But the Israhelites had weapons in part the Israelites might repair in Canaan, for over Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie used, and their present necessity ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites excelled in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were armed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that David himselfe slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims having parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spole and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Elquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adjoining. And though he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of denision called vpon his enemies: yet he so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and ieiulosity: they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoyled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that propheticke in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and twof them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the euenig, yet his sonne Jonathan being imbecilled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemed to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel, so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he preuailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandment of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert belonging to the Amalekites, from Hauilah towards Tigeris vnto Shur, which bordereth Aegypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Aegypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoyle of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefor did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vncexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouer-wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation about 400. yeeres afterwarde; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had beene by many boordlesse intrigues perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilead, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, untill the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrents betwene the reuelion of Saul and his death.

Now while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to chooe a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Israh: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might auoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom, hee sought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life; then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, where-with God hath enriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Israh, Samuel by God directed, made choice of David, the yongest, hauing refused Eliah, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beheldeth the heart. He also refusing the other sixe brethren, made choice of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flocks, for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neyther was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of David: in which bloody munde he continued till he died, ouercome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might be repayed with aduantage, if euer opportunity should serue their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part beene agreeable to their own wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes, as to a rempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with aneuellesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battel, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betwene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene so founded by the angry hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heauen were to bee feared. Goliath of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vnderooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouercome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to selfe young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe

to encounter the great strength of Goliath, vntill Dauid (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gygant, and after with his owne sword shooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who then had with his owne sword shooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who then had yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the covenent on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that eyther any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fedde Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Dag murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe and Asse, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commandement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying and pleading Dauids innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of cruetie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promised him; and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when Dauid had twice spared his life in the Terriorie of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet hee sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neere and faithful seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung out the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Iherusalem their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid afterward obtained; for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Ensebius, was Dauid borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunius in the tenth. For Dauid, saith he, was thirty yeres old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the 11. yeere of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus began his reigne over the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirty yeres. There are who place before him Latinus Sylvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus late in the Throne of Affyria, being the one and thirtieth King, he ruled that Empire fortie yeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, posselt a great part thereof 328. yeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Erastosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the sonne of Dencalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pithotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants; neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet eury seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned over it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, eyther because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Dencalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrrha. Dencalion & his wife Pyrrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrria (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrria the Queene. In Dencalions time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsewhere. Dencalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorws, and Aeolus: of Dorws and Aeolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Beotia. The Dores haue first inhabited sundrie parts of Thessalie, did afterward leave themselves about Par-nassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for haueing diuered from them to his owne vncle some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichon, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and leaving himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) hee afterwards departed; and leuying an Arinie, recouered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Troacian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing eury one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solimus then reigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wiues name in Aegialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and ouercomming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achai driuen to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Ionians desiring to inhabit Aegialia with them, and alleading in vaine, that Ion and Achaeus had bene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the sonne of Orestes in that Warre.

Thus were the Ionians driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remooue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionians into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeres after the descent of the Heraclidae into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeres. Of their Father of Theſſaly. For my ſelfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with theſe opinions, but onely to ſhew the vncertainty and diſagreement of Hiſtorians, as well in this particular, as in all other queſtions and diſpute of time. For the curioſitie of this manſage is no leſſe ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Mening, as perhaps containing ſome great myſterie. Induſtrion whereof Lucian ſaining himſelfe to haue bene in hell, and to haue ſpoken with Homer, there asked him the cauſe why he began his booke with that word: who anſwered, That he began in that ſort, becauſe it came in his head ſo to doe.

It ſeemeth that Senes, or after Macrobins, Senecires, ruled Aegypt at this time; for Tanepher ſobris was his ſuccellour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

Euſeb. C. 12. in Chron.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Caffiodorus, the Amazons with the Cymmerians invaded Aſia, Latinus Syluius then ruling in Italia. And beſides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy, which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time; there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by force of thoſe Northern Nations: but there ſprung vp ſomewhat neerely together, ſix Kingdomes into a greater ſtate not before erected. In Italia, that of the Latins; the South part of Greece, thoſe of Lacedamon, Corinth, and the Achaes. In Arabia, Syrus, Seba, and Damaſcus, the Adas made themſelves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Iſrael in effect: and ſomewhat before theſe, the State of the Iſraelites hauing now altered the forme of Government, began to ſhine vnder Kings, of which Dauid, in a few yeeres, became maſter of all thoſe neighbouring Nations who by interchange of times had ſubjected the Iudeans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a moſt abiection and grieuous ſlaueerie; to wit, the Edumaeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Itureans, and the reſt of the Arabians, with the Philiftims, Iſthites, Gethurites, Machabites; all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

§. I.

Of Dauids eſtate in the time of Saul.

THE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely deſigned King, and liuing as a priuate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The firſt perſonall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became knowne to Saul, and ſo highly affected of Jonathan the ſonne of Saul, that he loued him as his owne ſoule: In ſo much as when Saul fought to perſwade his ſon, that Dauid would aſſuredly be the ruine of his houſe, and eſtate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cauſe, Jonathan could neuer be perſwaded, neuer forſt, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this ſignall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were becomeas his houſhold ſervant, and his Eſquire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill ſpirit, was aduiſed to procure ſome cunning Muſician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde eaſe; which came to paſſe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpoſe, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant ſoone waxed wearie of his good affection, and fought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This paſſion firſt brake forth in the middeſt of his raiſing ſir, at which time he threw a ſpeare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him eaſe.

Conſec. 12. C. 12.

Conſorinus remembreth one Aſclepius a Phyſician, who practiſed the curing of the Frenzie; by the like Muſicke: and tempered thereby thoſe diſeaſes which grew from paſſion. That Pythagoras did alſo the like by ſuch a kinde of harmonic, Seneca in his third booke of anger witneſſeth. But the madneſſe of Saul came from the cauſe of cauſes, and and was thereby incurable, howſoeuer it ſometimes left him, and yielded vnto that Muſicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in ſuch open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 1000. ſouldiers, to confront the Philiftims withall. For hee durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philiftims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation), that the Philiftims would take Dauids head, than he their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories began new feares and iealouſies in Saul, he practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he fought to murder him in his owne houſe, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philiftim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelfe, he was fore to counterfeit both ſimplicitee and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiftims, he couered himſelfe in the Caue of Adullam: and after conuincing ſuch of his kinſfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelfe in the deſerts of Ziph, Maon and the hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſert of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his maſter Saul was knowne to proſecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simon, pretending to invade Iudaea: but he bent his forces another way and ſtrooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis ſuppoſing that Dauid had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himſelfe aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Iſrael, ſummoneth Dauid to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiftim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wiues with the wiues and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Here vpon his fellowes murined, but God gaue him comfort, and aſſurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

This arme of the Philiftims commanded by Achis, encountered Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſonnes were ſlaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the ſame Nation, who aſſured (though falſly) that himſelfe at Sauls requeſt had ſlaine him. Dauid, becauſe he had accuſed himſelfe, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to be ſlaine at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gaue ſtrong euidence withall. Otherwiſe it followeth not that every man ought to be beleeued of himſelfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confefſio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorato crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognofcentis. The priſoners conſeſſion muſt not be taken for an euidence of the crime, unleſſe ſome other prooffe informe the conſcience of the Iudge. For a man may conſeſſe thoſe things of himſelfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi conſeſſus, & in cap. de penis l. qui conſentiam, therefore doth the Gloſſe reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in iudicio ſponde de ſiſſo conſeſſetur, & poſtea maneat in conſeſſione, id eſt ſua. If any man in iudgement doe conſeſſe of himſelfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perſeuer in his conſeſſion, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul is not improbable, for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befall him, being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtirre vp ſorrow, and moue compaſſion in the heart of Dauid.

The victory which the Philiftims had gotten was ſo great, that ſome townes of the Iſraelites, euen beyond the riuer of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeeme ſtrange, that a Nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiftims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire.

Moſt

Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediatly breaking out betwene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie ouer both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, left by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which meanes, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vntied.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Ishbosh, according to Iosephus) though he had no right to the Kingdom of Israel: for Mephibosheth the first son of Ionathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entered the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Ioshab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountered each other the neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betwene the Lacedemonians and the Argues, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnlaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatij and Curiatij for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistin made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valor was so equal, as there suruiued not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here: for the army of Iuda prest Abner in groffe, and brake him. Three hundred and sixtiemen of Abners companions were slaine, and but twenty of Iuda: whereof Asahel the brother of Ioshab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moued to quit him, he was forced to turne upon him, wounded him to death, with the stroke of his speare. For though Asahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde Ro, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue murthered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage; yet here it fell out true, that the race is not to the swift.

2 Sam. 3.

Eccles. 9.

1 Reg. 10.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, we finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew ialousie betwene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Ioshab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

2 Sam. 3. 27.

2 Sam. 3. 39.

1 Reg. 2. 5.

After Abner, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Ioshab murdered; for Ioshab could not endure a companion in Dauids fauour, and in the commandement of his forces, by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbore to call him to account; for thus much he consideied of himselfe: I am this day weak, and these men of the houses of Zeruah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Ioshab, he followed him with this publike imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Ioshab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to plagues, to the leprosie, to Lamentation, to the sword, and to pouertie, &c. For could any thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Ioshab might greatly haue endangered Dauids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings himselfe were faine to giue them great respect, as hath bene already shewed more at large: This office Ioshab held in the armie of Iuda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in honour, and had bene partaker of all his aduersitie; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. In dedee he was by nature so ialous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward slew Asahel his owne kinsman and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him joynd with himselfe as captain of the hostes of Iuda; much lesse could he brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and bene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoeuer Ioshab did hate or despise Abner, Dauid esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the ouersight by which he might see to haue perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as 2 Sam. 3. a man falleth before wicked men, so (saide he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed vnwares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isboseth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he depaied greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were posside with great feare: in somuch as two of Isboseths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Isboseth, and presenting his head to Dauid, receiued the same reward that the Amalekites lately did, for pretending to haue slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annointed by generall consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, with two ouerthrowes giuen to the Philistines, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

When Dauid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their wals with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which Dauid loone after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing murthered the sort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) he became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Iosua, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites: others, that it had reference to the Conenant made long before with Isaac, and Isaac: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Conenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Israel, Iosua, the Indges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against Dauid.

When he had now posside himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and receiued congratulatory Embassadours and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained diuers other concubines and married moe wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wiues he had fixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistines hearing that Dauid was now annointed King, as wel of Iuda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his feat. And being encountered by Dauid at two seuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giantes, they were at both times ouerthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then Dauid assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conuict the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea, to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Yezah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, mulicke, dances, and all signes of ioyfullnesse, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne, That he was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgot his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it though she made it the colour of her derision, but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceiued that the sonne of Israhel had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wiues and concubines imbraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her brake out in those despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. c. v. 3.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatened, not in vaine, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars, which David had made were iust, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceiue themselves, who thinke by bloodshed and terrour of their warres, to make themselves in greatnesse like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; nor caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Sauour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the euerlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

1 Sam. 8. v. 1.

SOONER after this David ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Acceptit frantum Amgaru' & manu Philisthorum; which place our Englysh Geneva conuers into these words, And David tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Ianius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio. Casares, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Iudea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereto their retreat in all their inuasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Romus in B. c. of the second of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leaue one Smith in all their Cities and villages of that kinde, but infort them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoeuer they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1 Sam. 13.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betwene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abishai succoured David and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Countessors and Captaines of David (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himselfe in any battaile. The second and third encounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gisur, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie he sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

The Rabbines saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin 10 always enemies to Israel, and tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to secke the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobab, the region of Adadzer the sonne of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made vpon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David suauit alfo Hadadzer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadzer, it is not agreed vpon. Ianius thinks that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppress by Hadadzer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in 30 farre better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadzer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those vninhabited places, by which he was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But we finde that David returned to Ierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria Damascus, and of Danascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadzer was ouerthrowne by the Israelites, fearing his owne estate, and the losse of his owne country which adioyned to Syria Zobab of Hadadzer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadzer, and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Danascus, Iosephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow 50 vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descentes, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sacked the adioyned cities of Rebath, and Rebathi, belonging to Adadzer, of which Cities Ptolomee calleth Rebath, Tauaba, and Rebathi he nameth Barathena. Tobu or Thoi whose country of Hanath ioyned to Adadzer (as in the description of the Holy Land the reader may perceiue) sent his sonne Iosaphat to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had warre with Adadzer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse, all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iehon translated the words (chrycos aureos) by ymbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadazer, at such times Shichab the Aegyptian sackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hannun King of the Ammonites to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction vnder Saul, had bene relieved by Nabab, the father of Hannun. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-iculous of his estate, vsed Dauids messengers to so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre vpon himselfe, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalles of Adadazer twentie thousand, and of Maachab the North part of Yezreah re-inclosed in Doth, 3. 14. Ishob of Thob a countrey east vnder the rockyes of Stramon. 2 Sam. 11.

Adadazer hearing that Ishob had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and sent all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmirent, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Hierusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest off iourney that euer hee had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which Salem afterward strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had he two safe retreates, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter betweene David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Iunius conuerts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly haue slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth, in which number, as I conceiue, all the Souldiers that serued in them with the conductors are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before he forced them to tribute, 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Ishob slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Indu often: but the Kings of Israel they impowred euen to the last end of that State.

David hauing now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He sent out Ishob the Lieutenant of his armie to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after the Israelites mastered and posselt. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his owne head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierusalem, following the warre of Vriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie, and ready to be entered: yet Ishob in honour of David forbore the last assault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrival. To the people he vsed extreme rigour (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them he tare with har-rowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kilns, in which he baked tile and bricke.

§. VII.

Of Dauids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

¶ Vras victory begetteth security, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giuer of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly he had to please God in the precise obseruation of his Lawes and Commandements. For hauing now no dangerous apparant enemy (against whom he was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord) he began to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not onely satisfied to take Vriah his wife from him, and to vse her by stealth: but he imbrodered his adultery with Vriah slaughter, giuing order to his trustie seruant Ishob to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gaue an assault vpon the suburbs of Rabbah, when there was not as yet any possibility of preuailing. And, that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content to wit, of others of his best seruants and Souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe sorrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled vp by the rootes (as hee hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the winnells of Dauids owne mouth against him, as David himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to haue slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne error, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: Hee then vowed it to the liuing Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David, for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods iustice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall neuer depart from thy house, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Vriah with thy hand, &c. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slaine Vriah with thy hand, &c. Soone after this David lost the childre of adultery which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in loue with his halfe sister Thamar, by the aduise of his Cousin-german the sonne of Shimeon Dauids brother, posselt her by force: which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despightfull manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Abisalom caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheepe-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but hauing it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his affaire greatly aduanced by his destruction. So the one brother hauing rauished his owne sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice, first, made his owne brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and liued vnder the sauegard of Talmaj King of Gessur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abisalom by the inuention of Ishob, (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his preience; Hee began instantly to practise against David his father, see. king by the pretence of common iustice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equity, to win vnto himselfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

The company which Abisalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron, pretending though impiously, the performance of

of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Dauid doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris: but incamped in the fields, and dawns with some 600. of his gards, and few else. The priests he left in Hierusalem with the Arke of God, from whom he desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced, to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of *Abisalom*s party and confederacy, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolting Counsaillor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred *Dauid*s prosperity had smothered, but his aduersity illighted) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despihtfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbade Abisbai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenges, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now possessor of Hierusalem, was aduertised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Abisalom and his cause, without feare of being giuen vpon a reconciliation betwene them. This saluage and impious (though crafty counsaile) Achitophel indeede vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Dauid: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wiues before thine eyes, and giue them vnto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wiues in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He also gaue aduice to Abisalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of Dauid; which had willingly bene embraced by Abisalom, had not Hushai *Dauid*s faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduice, and swayed it: perswading Abisalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to pursue his father, than by such a troope, which *Dauid*s valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Abisalom, and aduantage of time gained by Dauid, was indeede, after God, the losse of the one, and deliuey of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forsooke both the party and the care of Abisalom, and of his owne life.

Dauid being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Abisbai himselfe in the warre against Dauid after *Saul*s death seated himselfe. To which place also there repaired vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahab the Ammonite, whom Dauid loved, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannun, whom Dauid for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after *Hannun*s ouerthrow. In thankfulness whereof he relieved Dauid in this his extremity. There came also to *Dauid*s assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his company.

In the meane time both the King and Abisalom prepared to fight, Abisalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Joab held with Dauid, an office next the King himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace aunciently in France. Dauid, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abisbai, and Ittai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and newes brought him that Abisalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree; when he could not perswade him messenger to returne and kill him; he himselfe with his owne seruants dispatcht him.

It appeared also by the sequell that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Abisalom, he embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not onely as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outlived all his worldly ioyes, and seene euery delight of life interred. For he so had himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, couered themselves also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the Armie. For first, he told him that he had discourtenanted his faithfull seruants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrary, grieve and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abisalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he vrged that it was generally beleueed, that he loved his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom liued, than in the victory by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he vse this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publicly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening: And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Joab raised Dauid from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Armie of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Abisalom had giuen him, and which Joab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandment.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but extorted, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephiboseth his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly fallly accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in Dauid, the Armie brake, and Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the sonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King, Dauid employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witness his trust, as also because he conceiued that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Joab had. He receiued commandment from Dauid to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abisbai, *Joab*s brother, was sent after him, with *Dauid*s guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibcom, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no lesse ialous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and slung it to Joab ouer the walls: which done, he retrained his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the hoste of Israel.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliuerie of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers cruelty. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also if we may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered; onely he spared Achishbozeib the sonne of Ionathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of Rispah, whom he bare vnto Saul, and the five sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites:

Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, the whom Saul married to Phaltiel; but Michol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid, when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, and figurative, as I am informed, one of the same kindred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. Chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weightie as a weauers beame, when as by the same Eclipse it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath: Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leaving no head vnto rebellion; so did he strengthen both the King and Nation against forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number and quality, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirte Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Over these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue bene given vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abisai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the army, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neere kinne of bloud vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue bene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if neede required, into the field, vary farre exceeded thirty thousand, yea, or thirty times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and bene hardened with his aduersities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their feuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we finde nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had bene too hard for Dauid, were wome away, and onely Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abisai to stand by his side in his last extremities.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seauen yeeres of entire quiet and security, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his Fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirtene hundred thousand, besides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Iuda and the Cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased, to wit, seauen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth vs this diuine reason; For his mercies are great.

6. VIII.

Of the last acts of Dauid, Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimei.

As soone as he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned man, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Amnon and Absalom being now dead) hauing drawne vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Mathew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carry the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Resabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her sonne should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, and seconding her report of Adonijahs presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Peletites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonijah, hee presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon, the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all meanes to aduance, and make the business publicke. To bring these intentions to good effect, hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the feuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who did repair vnto Ierusalem.

In this assembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Heerein he tooke occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Isaac in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choyce of him among all his Fathers sonnes. In like manner hee said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, hee exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approued by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of silver, they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, and great reueneue, yet needs there must haue beene some other great meanes. It seemes that he made the vttermoſt profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Dauid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a naue in Melania (or as Vallapandus corrects it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Cypre, which Ortelius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Iury. Pineda, lib. 4. de rebus Salamonis, c. 1. thinkes that Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimony of Eupolemus: and yet certainly Dauid had many other waies to gather riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitfull valleys neere Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other Countreies bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1. Chron. 17. that Iehonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes; that Extri was ouer the labourers that tilled his ground, Sime ouer the vineyards; and Sabdo ouer the store of the wine; Baal Hanan ouer the Oliue trees, and Ioshu ouer the fcare of the oyle: also that hee had herd-men that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his Sheepe, Camels, and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and Cattell, the ancient Kings euer where held, both before and after Dauid's time. For wee reade of Pharao, that he spake to Ioseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their seruants, to bee Rulers ouer his cattell. Wee reade of Vezia, that hee loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greece Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlkely, but that those captiues which were not employed in husbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all sorts of gainefull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yeerely were brought him, or extraordinary sent him, by Toba and others) wee may adde the great spoyle which hee found in the Cities and Countreies which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitatiouis; by the law of capitation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a sicke of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as foureteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seuentie thousand fighting men were numbred by Iosab. Now although this Law of capitation bee thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuerthelessse they confesse is against the Hebrew exposition) yet Dauid vpon this occasion is not vnlkely to haue put it in practice. And by these meanes might he be able to leaue those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that this great masse of gold and siluer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in priuate, and so will it appeare the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that hee gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand talents of siluer, a great summe: but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore wee are to consider, that the treasures of the sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must haue beene hauing receiued continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution euer since the time of Moses and Iosuah. The reuenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of riches and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoyle gotten in warre. For all the bootie was diuided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countreie receiued benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiuing more for euery single share.

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people receiued, and one in five hundred, of that which was giuen to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoyle of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the Arnie had sixtene thousand of them for slaues, and the Congregation had other sixtene thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand giuen to the Arnie, were exempted two & thirtie for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this meanes, the lesler that the Arnie was which had exposed it selfe to danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier, but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordinarie trauaile in domestick affaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and siluer, and other mettalls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Philistines with the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like were offered vp, as voluntarie presents.

Now howeouer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer got possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must haue beene exceeding great, as containing aboute one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; seeing that before the time of Dauid and his Lieutenant Iosab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vsed to dedicate of the spoyle obtained in warre, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Iudges and Captaines of other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Dauid brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Iosua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of a hundred thousand Talents of siluer, may seeme rather to haue bene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to haue beene the mere fruits of his owne industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he receiued of yeerely reuennues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage euery three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his reigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all Iudas and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians; his borders, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmirena, of Iura; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Ittities, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet dextinguished, though subiected.

In this flourishing estate was the Kingdom of Israel reduced by Dauid, who after 40 yeers raigne, and 70. yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. It is written by Iosephus that there was hid in Dauid's Tombe a maruailous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chismanis, or race of Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem; and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and siluer therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleued, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall considered that his want of monie grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of Dauid the Scriptures haue no mention, but onely the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the

Monuments

30. yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should be giuen to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram which liued both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

OF SALOMON.

§. I.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birthright, and the cause of Adonijahs death, and of Salomons wisdom.

SALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Juda and Israel, in the yeere of the World 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: acquaintance betweene Princes very ancient. Whence wee reade that

Dauid did in like fort salute Hiram King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom.

The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to be slaine by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijahs desiring by Bertheba, that the young maide Abisag (which lay in Dauids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be giuen to him. Whatsoever hee pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the kingdom contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God inclined to towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wife, and hee that sees but the claw, may know whether it be a Lyon or no: so it may seem that to the quick sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Abisag to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not giue them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed vntill their death.

And this it seemes was the depth of Isoseths quarrell against Abner, for hauing his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid: I haue giuen thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives.

And in the words of Saul vbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen Dauid to the flame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereunto perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conueying of the Kingdom to Salomon. There might be diuers further occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that hee would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might preiudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes; yet the Kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Jacobs disheriting Reuben, and giuing the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeareth by the words of Bertheba and Nathan to Dauid, and of Jonathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirme, or that the refusal of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder elder brothers right to the Kingdom, it now here appears in the stories of the Iewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt. In like manner elsewhere the phrase of choosing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, hee rid himselfe also of Joab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Dauid had aduised him: hee displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed Dauid in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his Father, hee spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdom, hee tooke the daughter of Ephraim King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; Salomon chooseth wisdom, which pleased God. And God said vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I haue done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selues what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the conueying after long life in respect of our selues, cannot but proceed of selfe-loue, which is the roote of all impietie: the desire of priuate riches is an affection of couetousnesse which God abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in minde of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant cyther from Dauid, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisdom onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to giue him withall that which he desired not. And I haue also giuen thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wisdom our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and liuing creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisdom, was in the knowledge of governing his kingdom: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdom, the Scripture telleth how soone he iudged the controuersie betweene the two harlots.

§. II.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HE then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had receiued a double charge, one from his father Dauid, and another from God. For like as it is writen of Dauid, that Hee called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord God of Israel: so doth Tostatus giue the force of a diuine precept to these words, Behold, a sonne is borne vnto thee, &c. Hee shall build an house for my Name.

He began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yeere of his reigne, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Eziongeber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almagim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the forme and example was giuen by God himselfe) many learned men haue written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azarius, Philopandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which serued that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand euery month by course: hee also vfed 80. thousand Malons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued; hee selected out of the Proflies, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his worke, so as hee paid and employed in all one hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Sidonians which were farre more skilfull skilfull in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I thinke) bee included. For Hiram caused his seruants to bring downe the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in raftes to Ioppe, or the next port to Iherusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaide, that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouer-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth, the vassals of Hiram, and of aphres King of Aegypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand measures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eusebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Hiram and Hiram) King of Tyre in these words :

REX Salomon Saroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicie regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scimus me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumq; mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creauit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præceptis: Scribo igitur, & peto ut ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

KING Salomon to King Saron, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phœnicia King, and my fathers friend, sendeth greeting: You may vnderstand that I haue receiued of the great God of my father David, the Kingdome: and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heauen and earth, hee commanded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

SYRON, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicie rex, Salomoni regi salutem. Lætis literis gratias ego Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros ministrosq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, nisi ad te nulla hominum oîginta, & Architectum Tyrium binem ex matre Iudæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabit igitur ut necessarii non egeant, & Templo Dei cõdito ad nos redeant.

SYRON of Tyre, Sidon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: when I read your letters, I gaue God thanks, who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that Carpenters and workemen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I haue sent you some score thousand men, and a Master-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Iewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to vs.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time, as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne, as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Salomon and Hiram cyther by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Iosephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is said to haue written to aphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors vpon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and aphres King of Egypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemus in Eusebius, I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eusebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Iosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the Iewes Antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and vsed likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, in so much as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had bene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosuahs time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: hee built Bethanion, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Iherusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie: The place and territorie hee gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then buied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entrusted his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hee thereby taught the Aegyptians to visit those parts againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Shebuck this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan, and Belah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamaron in the desert of Iuda, or (as Iosephus thinks) Palmyra in the desert of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vnmort border of Salomons dominion to the north east of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when hee wan Damascus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadmora, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadmora, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadmora, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Iosephus calls this place Thadmora, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was possesit by the Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, hee made a iourney into Syria Zobab, and established his tributaries, the first and last warre (if in that expedition he were driuen to fight) that he made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence hee visited Ezion geber and Eloth, the vtermoost place of the South of all his territories; bordering to the red sea; which Cities I haue described in the storie of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pinedas conceit of two strange passages about Africke.

ERE Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Dauid, did the Fleet passe to the East Indus, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: whence the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manila, and recover a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to foure hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight; it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and 420. talents; which makes siue and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crownes, came eleence: And thus must those two places bee reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred sixty and fixe talents of gold, that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yeerely; and which came to him besides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as diuers haue thought) but a Country in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to Ierusalem from the East Indies then in three yeers; and that Tharfis in Scripture is diuers times taken for the Ocean, hath bene already declared in the first booke.

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batca, would faine haue Gades or Calu-malis, in olde times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Prouince, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for loue of his own countrie, and because of some affinitie of sound betwene Tharsis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seeme strange that it should be three yerres ere they thatooke ship in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered already. And further, the intelligent may conceiue of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betwene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elsewhere: so that wee haue no need to make to Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africa, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrin, which went with them, could not haue bene ignorant of) was along the Mediterransea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconueniences, and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should haue escaped the troublesome land-carriage betwene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desert, and theeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of Ierusalem at Ioppe, or some other hauen in Salomons owne Countrie, haue laden and vnladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis is largeness greater than all Africa and Asia, being swallowed vp in the Atlantic Ocean hundred Salomons ships from passing through the Straits of Gibraltar: for this hea-leadgeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamitie happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpassable, that there could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran sea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scowreth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to haue stood: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath all the rich Peru in the West, fortineth in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manila, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the small territorie which hee there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

As it appeares

at Ioppe or Ioppe. l. 1. c. 3.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreames of: supposing whereas Ionas sailing to Tharsis the Citie of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken vp there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming about twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterran sea, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast vp Ionas vpon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might haue perhaps some fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Nimue. This conceit he grounds onely vpon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haue it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giueth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preseruation of Ionas in the bellie of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And againe, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio noua fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor deliuered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore we leaue this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwise very learned and iudicious) might bee thought vnworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes, from Arabia felix, and not, as some thinke, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons respectfull magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Iosaphus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queene of Sabaes, Nicantes,

Nicantes, the succellour (saith he out of Hierodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia, so were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. Yea, about three hundred yerres after Salomon, Pharao Necho slew Iosias King of Iuda.
2 King. c. 23. c. 2.
2 Chron. 35. 26.
16. c. 46. v. 2.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garisons foureteene thousand Chariots, and twelue thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court euery day thirtie measures of fine flower, threecore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stales of horses he had for his chariots and other vses, and for the twelue thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but foure thousand stals or teemes, and in euery teemeten horses, as Iunius and the Genena vnderstand it. He was said to be wiser than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrak. For the Genena maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iosaphus writeth them Athan, Eman, Chalcaus and Donan the sonnes of Hemon. He spake three thousand Prouerbes, and his songs were one thousand and fise, whereof either the most part perished in the Captiuitie of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Ciuill causes and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods booke.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he liued.

Now as he had plenty of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seuen hundred Wiues, he kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) he tooke Wiues out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heb: and when hee fell a doting, his Wiues turned his heart after other Gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumæa, Rex of Damascus, and by Ierobam his owne seruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vitatur, qua ipse non fecit. God in punishing sinners, vseth the finnes of others, which he himselfe wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie yerres he reigned: how many he liued, it is not written, and must therefore be found onely by coniecture. The most likely way to guess at the truth in this case, is by considering the actions of Dauid before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the yerres which they consumed, and consequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yerres Dauid reigned in Hebron: in his eighth yeere he tooke Ierusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke seemes to haue bene in the tenth yeere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leisure, liuing in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs haue held him fise yerres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadazer; and that in euery of these warres he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely that these seruices occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no winingr camps in use, but at conuenient seasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly vpon the priuate prouision which euery soldier made for himselfe. In the sixe and twentieth of Salomons reigne Hiram of Tyre died, to whom Balthazar succeeded, and reigned seuentene yeres, after Mercators account, who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sonnes. Iosephus giues him fewer yeres. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolicus finds Borzoris the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted betwene the death of Hiram, and the reigne of Borzoris.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesic or Shifak (as our Englishe Genesie termes him) began to gouerne in Agypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sofachis, Iosephus, Susac, Cedrenus, Susimus, Eusebius in the column of the Agyptian Kings, Smendes, and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Iosephus in the eight of his Antiquities reprooueth it as an error in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the acts of Susac to Sesistris, which perchance Herodotus might haue done by comparison, accounting Sesistris another Sesistris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesistris I haue spoken already in the story of the Agyptian Princes: onely in this he was reprov'd, that he caused foure of his captiue Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seene, and to ride in triumph: one of which foure, saith Entropius, at such time as Sesistris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe vpon the two fore-most wheeles next him; which Sesistris perceiuing, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captiue King answered, that in those he beheld the instabillity of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the vprmost part was suddainly turned downeward and vnder all: which when Sesistris had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesistris, and that he could not be taken for Sesac, I haue spoken at large in that part of the Agyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors vntill the end of Iehosaphat.

§. 1.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings: the defection of the ten Tribes, and Ieroboams Idolatry.

Rehoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitess, now forty yeres old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Agypt, since he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amare mallet quam metui. So should his Empire (saith Iosephus) be more assured, if he desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof he tooke three dayes to deliberate before his answer, of whom therefore it could not be said as of Dauid, that he was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe he knew not how to resolve, so had he not the iudgement to discern of counsels, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crush them; but (vaunting fallily of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatened in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more vnsupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the successe, those younger aduisers greatly mistooke the nature of security, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it selfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be sought for the helpe, and not for the harme of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters haue euer lasted long, but those which haue bene twisted

Ant. 1. 8. c. 31

twisted and forged by loue onely? His wiseleffe parasites could well iudge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designs. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achab of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion haue we in Dauid? we haue no inheritance in the Sonne of Israhel. Now though themselves, eu'n all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Dauids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bands of nature, and their dutie to God, and as all alienated resolute hearts doe, they serued themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hartfull to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed; and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was stayed for the present. In the meane time Ieroboam the new King fortified Sichem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exorcise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of Dauid; and hauing in all likelihood also promised the Agyptians to follow their Idolatry: he set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods; or at least by these he represented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Agypt: and refusing the seruice of the Leuites, he made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Leuites which serued Dauid and Salomon through all Israel, Ieroboam greatly enriched himselfe: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were giuen them by Moses and Iosua, for as it is writtten, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iada, &c. This irreligious policie of Ieroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that neuer could be rooted out, vntill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophetic and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophetic nor Miracles could make them yeelde. Ieroboam could not be moued now by the authority of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdom; nor by the withering of his owne hand as he stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claued a funder, according to the signe, which the man of God had giuen him by the commandment of God, who againe recouered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the fittest course in policie to preceede as he had begun. This impious inuention of Ieroboam, who forooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sic qui hodie (saith he) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, presentisq; utilitates sibi tanquam vltimum finem constituent, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promouenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si iniuria proximo irroganda, si iniustitia honestatisq; leges subueriende, si religio ipsa pessumdanda, si deniq; omnia iura diuina, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per sua esse sibi persudant, obtrineant, & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per sua esse sibi persudant, obtrineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigare possit Deus. So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves, as their vprmost end and scope, their owne commoditie and so present profit; are wont to allenge the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state; for aduancings, preserving, or encreasing of the state; they thinke that they may doe any thing: if they meane to oppress their neighbour, to overturne all lawes of iustice and honesty, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing: let all goe to ruine, what canst thou, so long as they may haue what they would, as who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeede this allegation of raggione del stato, did serue as well to vp-hold, as at the first first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Vpon this ground Amazias the Priest of Bethel, counsaile the Prophet Amos, not to prophetic at Bethel; for (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Vpon this ground euen Iehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeale for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique Sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henrie the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsooke, obeyed him, but some of the Papiists whom he followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizzor of wise proceeding delude euen those that know the foule face of impietie lurking vnder it, and behold the wretched ends that haue euer followed it; whereof Iehu and all the Kings of Israel had to and were themselves very great examples.

§. II.

Of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sefac: of his end and Contemporaries.

WHile Ieroboam was occupied in setting vp his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, hauing now little hope to recouer the Provinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining, with all endeavour: for he fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Judah and Beniamin: not that he feared Ieroboam alone, but the Aegyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not onely fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to invade Judea: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Dauid and Solomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judeans. So as by those two wayes (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraigne force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselfe in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, hauing as he thought, by fortifying diuers places, assured his estate, forsooke the Law of the liuing God, and made high places, and Images, and Groues on euery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his reigne, Sefac or Shishac before spoken of being now King of Aegypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumea, as Ieroboam, were familiar, and his instruments, entred Judea with twelue thousand Chariots, and three score thousand Horse, besides foot-men, which Iosephus numbers at foure hundred thousand. This Armie was composed of foure Nations: Aegyptians, Lubeans, Succaans, and Cusites. The Lubeans were Lybeans, the next bordering Region to Aegypt, on the West-side. The Cusites were of Petrea, and of the Desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against Asa King of Juda. The Succaans according to Iunius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodytes, mentioned often in Plinie, Prolemeus, and other Authors. The Troglodytes inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about six hundred English miles from the best and Maritimate part of Aegypt: and therefore I doe not think that the Succians, or Succai were those Troglodytes, but rather those Arabians which Prolemeus calls Arabes Aegypti, or, Ichthyophagi, which possesse that part of Aegypt betwene the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, farre neerer Aegypt and readier to be leuiued then those remoued Sauages of the Troglodytes.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sefac invaded Judea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which Dauid recouered from Adadexer, in the Syrian war: so these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brasse, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Aegypt claimed the Soueraignty of Judea, and held the Towers as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it seemes, rendering vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the word of God, where premising the deliuerance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them vnder the yoke of Aegypt, in these words: Newer thelesse, they (to wit, the Iudeans) shall be his seruants, that is, the seruants of Sefac.
